Petitioners submit that in no instance has Congress conditioned the enjoyment of a federally created right on the race or color of citizens upon whom the right is conferred, and that in every instance in which Congress has made reference to race or color of citizens in its legislation the purpose of the reference has been to eliminate or diminish the effect of a real or threatened disability based upon race. It is axiomatic that since the time that Negroes became citizens of the United States Congress has repeatedly sought through the legislative power to achieve equality and eliminate inequality of all citizens without regard to race or color. A clear line of intent is seen from the enactment of the civil rights statutes shortly after the Civil War to the recent amendments to the National Labor Relations Act.

THE ACTION OF THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IS INDICATIVE OF THIS FEDERAL POLICY.

In recent years the President of the United States and his subordinates in the executive branch have come to exercise an increasing quantum of regulatory control over the conduct of citizens of the United States. There has arisen both by virtue of legislative delegation as well as executive initiative a great body of federal administration of important social and economic programs affecting the relationship between the citizen and the Federal Government. In the administration of these programs, care has been taken to see to it that enjoyment of the benefits of the programs would in no instance be conditioned upon the factors of race or color. Again it is submitted that there is no instance of federal action by the executive in which the enjoyment of a federally created right has been conditioned upon the race or color of the citizen. Moreover, in areas peculiarly within the purview of the executive the following specific affirmative efforts have been made to eliminate such racial distinctions as are found to exist in the government-citizen relationship:

1. The President's Committee on Civil Rights.

Former President Harry S. Truman created a committee to determine to what extent law-enforcement measures may be strengthened and improved to safeguard the civil rights of the people, President's Committee on Civil Rights, Executive Order 9808, December 5, 1946. The report and recommendations of this committee dealt largely with the injustices and inequalities found in the economic, social and political life of Negroes. The Report of the President's Committee on Civil Rights, "To Secure These Rights." (GPO.: 1947), passim.

2. The President's Contract Compliance Order.

Executive Order 10210, Sect. 7, February 6, 1951, prohibited discrimination solely on the basis of race or color by an employer who obtains a government contract. Executive Order No. 10308, December 6, 1951, extended and improved this prohibition, and created a committee, composed of government officials, to ferret out and correct any breaches thereof. These Executive Orders were rescinded and replaced by Executive Order No. 10479, August 13, 1953, which provided that the Vice President of the United States be Chairman, and incorporated the substance of the two Executive Orders above-mentioned.

3. The President's Statement as to segregation in the District of Columbia.

President Eisenhower, in his State of the Union Message to the Congress, February 2, 1952, said that he will use the power of his office to wipe out segregation in the Nation's Capital.

4. The Ending of Segregation in all parks, playgrounds and restaurants operated by the Federal Government.

Numerous Federal Regulations prohibit segregation on the basis of race or color in all parks, playgrounds, and restaurants operated by the federal government, 36 C. F. R. 1.60, 12.7, 3.45 (1949 ed. and pocket Supplement); 14 C. F. R. 570.16 (1949 ed.).

5. The Ending of Segregation in the Armed Services.

Executive Order 9981, July 26, 1948, declared it to be the policy of the President that there be equality of treatment and opportunity for all persons in the armed services without regard to race, color, religion or national origin.

6. Fair Employment Practice Order for Federal Government.

Executive Order 9980, July 26, 1948, commanded that all personnel actions taken by Federal appointing officers be based solely on merit and fitness; and that in all such actions there shall be no discrimination because of race or color. This Order is amplified by Executive Order No. 10479, supra.

7. The ending of segregation in Housing projects in the District of Columbia.

By resolution of the National Housing Authority June 4, 1953, the policy of segregation in Housing projects in the District of Columbia was abandoned.

8. District of Columbia Contract Compliance Order.

The District of Columbia Contract Compliance Order, G. F. 47-030, L. S. 6000-B, October 26, 1953, provides that no employer receiving a District of Columbia government contract shall discriminate against any citizen because of race or color in the execution of that contract.

> And be it further enacted, That the said levy court may in its discretion, and if it shall be deemed by said court best for the interest and welfare of the colored people residing in said County, levy an annual tax of one-eighth of one percent. on all the taxable property in said county outside the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, owned by persons of color, for the purpose of initiating a system of education of colored children in said county, which tax shall be collected in the same manner as the tax named in section thirteen of this Act. And said trustees are authorized to receive any donations or contributions that may be made for the benefit of said schools by persons disposed to aid in the elevation of the colored population in the District of Columbia, and to apply the same in such manner as in their opinion shall be best calculated to effect the object of the donors, said trustees being required to account for all funds received by them, and to report to the commissioners in accordance with the provisions of section twenty-two of this Act.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the board of trustees aforesaid shall possess all the powers, exercise the same functions, and have the same supervision over the schools provided for in this act as are now exercised by them over the public schools now existing in said cities by virtue of the laws and ordinances of the Corporation thereof.

All members of the respective boards of examiners shall serve without additional compensation."

It is quite clear from an examination of the above Acts of Congress that they possess no language of a mandatory character. The language is capable of an interpretation that it is a recognition by the Congress of the fact that separate private schools existed in the District long before public schools were supported by Congress. Only precise and concrete language requiring segregation of the races could overcome the historical fact that this language was approved by the Congress that opposed every type of racial distinction by Government.

The history as well as the language of these various Acts demonstrate an intention by the legislature at least to guarantee minimum opportunities to the colored children at a time when serious objections were made to any public education for them. Certainly there were those members of Congress who probably believed that for the newly freed Negro public education might best be secured in separate schools for an adjustment period. All that this means is that the legislature sought to give recognition to voluntary separation. It seems doubtful that this Court today would conclude that such a delegation of power by Congress would be constitutional even if such an intent be found to exist.

The problem posed in the Bolling case is whether this Court, as the final arbiter, believes that segregated education in the District of Columbia comports, in 1953, with the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. We believe that respondents have erroneously concluded that "upon this point a page of history is worth a volume of logic." Mr. Justice Peckham cautioned against the danger of this approach when he said:

> "What speeches were made by other Senators, and by Representatives in the House, upon this subject is not stated by counsel, nor does he state what construction was given to it, if any, by other members of Congress. It is clear that what is said in Congress upon such an occasion may or may not express the views of the majority of those who favor the adoption of the measure which may be before that body, and the question whether the proposed amendment itself expresses the meaning which those who spoke in its favor may have assumed that it did, is one to be determined by the language actually therein used and not by the speeches made regarding it.

BLEED THROUGH

"What individual Senators or Representatives may have urged in debate, in regard to the meaning to be given to a proposed constitutional amendment, or bill or resolution, does not furnish a firm ground for its proper construction, nor is it important as explanatory of the grounds upon which the members voted in adopting it. United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association, 166 U.S. 290, 318; Dunlap v. United States, 173 U.S. 65, 75.

"In the case of a constitutional amendment it is of less materiality than in that of an ordinary bill or resolution. A constitutional amendment must be agreed to, not only by Senators and Representatives, but it must be ratified by the legislatures, or by conventions, in three fourths of the States before such amendment can take effect. The safe way is to read its language in connection with the known condition of affairs out of which the occasion for its adoption may have arisen, and then to construe it, if there be therein any doubtful expressions, in a way so far as is reasonably possible, to forward the known purpose or object for which the amendment was adopted. This rule could not, of course, be so used as to limit the force and effect of an amendment in a manner which the plain and unambiguous language used therein would not justify or permit." Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U.S. 581, 601, 602.

Hence, it is petitioners' position that neither the intent which may be inferred from a review of history, nor the action or inaction of Congress is controlling in this matter.

This Court as early as Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch (U.S.) 137, 177, 2 L. ed. 60, announced:

"It is a proposition too plain to be contested, that the constitution controls any legislative act repugnant to it; or that the legislature may alter the constitution by an ordinary act . . .

> It is, emphatically, the province and duty of the judicial department, to say what the law is"

This Court has stated that the Fifth Amendment is a limitation upon all three branches of the Federal Government, hence Congress could not make any process "due process". Den ex dem. Murray v. Hoboken Land Improvement Co., 18 How. 272, 276, 15 L. Ed. 372. In St. Joseph Stock Yard Co. v. U. S. et al., 298 U.S. 38, 51-52, Mr. Chief Justice Hughes, speaking for the Court, stated that the rate-making power of Congress was limited by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment, so that when the legislature acted in that matter

> "its action is subject to judicial scrutiny and determination in order to prevent the transgression of these limits of power. The legislature cannot preclude that scrutiny and determination by any declaration or legislative finding. Legislative declaration or finding is necessarily subject to independent judicial review upon the facts and the law by courts of competent jurisdiction to the end that the Constitution as the supreme law of the land may be maintained."

This Court in Baltimore & Ohio R.R. Co. v. U.S., 298 U.S. 364, 56 S. Ct. 805, cited with approval the Murray and St. Joseph Stock Yard Co. cases, supra, when concluding that what constitutes due process of law is for judicial ascertainment. These petitioners' constitutional rights cannot be defeated by the existence or non-existence of legislation.

This Court in exercising its exclusive judicial function of determining whether respondents' actions are violative of the Fifth Amendment must decide whether racial classification in affording public education today satisfies due process. As Judge Edgerton, dissenting in Carr v. Corning, 86 U.S. App. D.C. 173, 182 F. 2d 14, 33 said:

> "When the Fifth Amendment was adopted Negroes in the District of Columbia were slaves, not entitled to unsegregated schooling or to any schooling. Con> gress may have been right in thinking Negroes were not entitled to unsegregated schooling when the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted. But the question what schooling was good enough to meet their constitutional rights 160 or 80 years ago is different from the question what schooling meets their rights now. 'It is of the very nature of a free society to advance in its standards of what is deemed reasonable and right. Representing as it does a living principle, due process is not confined within a permanent catalogue of what may at a given time be deemed the limits of the essentials of fundamental rights'." Citing Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25, 27, 69 S.Ct. 1359, 1361.

BLEED THROUGH

The petitioners believe that the words of Chief Justice Hughes in Home Building & Loan Association v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398, 442-443, are apropos to this court's present determination of whether respondents may make racial classifications today in affording public school education to these petitioners:

> "It is manifest from this review of our decisions that there has been a growing appreciation of public needs and of the necessity of finding ground for a rational compromise between individual rights and public welfare. The settlement and consequent contraction of the public domain, the pressure of a constantly increasing density of population, the interrelation of the activities of our people and the complexity of our economic interests, have inevitably led to an increased use of the organization of society in order to protect the very bases of individual opportunity. Where, in earlier days, it was thought that only the concerns of individuals or of classes were involved, and that those of the State itself were touched only remotely, it has later been found that the fundamental interests of the State are directly affected; and that the question is no longer merely that of one party to a contract as against another, but of the use of reasonable means to safeguard the economic structure upon which the good of all depends.
> "It is no answer to say that this public need was not apprehended a century ago, or to insist that what the provision of the Constitution meant to the vision of that day it must mean to the vision of our time. If by the statement that what the Constitution meant at the time of its adoption it means today, it is intended to say that the great clauses of the Constitution must be confined to the interpretation which the framers, with the conditions and outlook of their time, would have placed upon them, the statement carries its own refutation. It was to guard against such a narrow conception that Chief Justice Marshall uttered the memorable warning—'We must never forget that it is a constitution we are expounding' (McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 407)—'a constitution intended to endure for ages to come, and consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs.' Id., p. 415. When we are dealing with the words of the Constitution, said this Court in Missouri v. Holland, 252 U.S. 416, 433, 'we must realize that they have called into life a being the development of which could not have been foreseen completely by the most gifted of its begetters . . . The case before us must be considered in the light of our whole experience and not merely in that of what was said a hundred years ago'."

Respondents can point to no law in the District of Columbia which would be violated by the admission of these minor petitioners to the Sousa Junior High School. In Ex Parte Endo, supra, this Court said at page 299-300:

"We mention these constitutional provisions not to stir the constitutional issues which have been argued at the bar but to indicate the approach which we think should be made to an Act of Congress or an order of the Chief Executive that touches the sensitive area of rights specifically guaranteed by the Constitution. This Court has quite consistently given a narrower scope for the operation of the presumption of constitutionality when legislation appeared on its face to violate a specific prohibition of the Constitution. We have likewise favored that interpretation of legislation which gives it the greater chance of surviving the test of constitutionality. Those analogies are suggestive here. We must assume that the Chief Executive and > members of Congress, as well as the courts, are sensitive to and respectful of the liberties of the citizen. . . . We must assume, when asked to find implied powers in a grant of legislative or executive authority, that the law makers intended to place no greater restraint on the citizen than was clearly and unmistakably indicated by the language they used."

BLEED THROUGH

Assuming that Congress has the power to compel segregation of American citizens in the Schools of the District of Columbia, though we deny that Congress has it, our present inquiry is, has Congress enacted any statute specifically granting such power to the District of Columbia School Board? In pursuing this inquiry, we are free of entangling juridical concepts which concern themselves with balancing the interests of the states with that of the Federal Government. This case presents a federal matter pure and simple. At the outset, it should be remembered that we are to be guided by the advice of this Court given in Ex Parte Endo, supra, namely, that when the Congress of the United States purports to place restraints on its citizens through Congressional enactments the language of those enactments must clearly and unmistakably indicate both the intended extent and scope of such restraints and clearly define the authority granted to the agency which is to administer the Act. See also Steele v. Louisville & Nashville Ry. Co., supra. Moreover, when as in this case these restraints involve odious distinctions between citizens because of their race, (Hirabayashi v. U. S., 320 U. S. 81, 100) we think this Court should demand and require that respondents point out the specific language, in haec verba, in which it is asserted that Congress has granted this power of racial segregation. If this Court should do so, it would place no unreasonable burden upon the legislature. As a general rule when legislatures have intended to compel the separation of races in public schools they have done so with simple, easily found, and easily understood words, combining these words into language which none who read could doubt.

An inspection of the constitutions and laws of the states where segregation by law is in vogue demonstrates the proposition that where the law-making body intended a compulsory segregated educational pattern it expressly and clearly said so. As early as 1875 the Constitution of Alabama contained the following phrase: "But separate schools shall be provided for the children of the citizens of African descent." Alabama Const. 1875, Article XII, Section 1. It now provides, in its Constitution of 1901, that "no child of either race shall be permitted to attend a school of the other race." Alabama Const. 1901, Article XIV, Section 256. In Arkansas a statute charges the school directors in each district with the duty to establish separate schools for white and colored persons. Acts 1931, No. 169, Sec. 97, P. 476; Popes Dig. Sec. 11535. Delaware provides, "and separate schools for white and colored children shall be maintained." Delaware Const. 1897, Article X, Section 2. The Florida Constitution of 1885 commands that "White and colored children shall not be taught in the same school." Florida Const. 1885, Art. XII, Sec. 12. As early as 1877, the Constitution of Georgia read, "but separate schools shall be provided for white and colored races." Georgia Const. 1877, Art. VIII, Sec. 1. There has to date been no change in this requirement. Kentucky's Constitution of 1890 says, "Separate schools for white and colored children shall be maintained." Ky. Const. 1890, Sec. 187. That is the law of Kentucky today. Louisiana's Constitution of 1898 provides for "free public schools for the white and colored races separately established." La. Const. 1898, Art. 245. That "separate public schools shall be maintained for the education of white and colored children" is still the dictate of its present Constitution. La. Const. 1921, Art. 12, Sec. 1. The Mississippi Constitution of 1890 declares that "separate schools shall be maintained for children of the white and colored races." Miss. Const. 1890, Sec. 207. "Separate free public schools shall be established for the education of children of African descent."

Mo. Const. 1875, Laws, 1945 P. 50. North Carolina—"And the children of the white race and the children of the colored race shall be taught in separate public schools." N. C. Const. 1876, Art. IX, Sec. 2. Oklahoma provides: "Separate schools for white and colored children with like accommodation shall be provided by the Legislature and impartially maintained." (Const. 1907, as amended Stat. 1931, 13676). Constitution Art. XIII, Sec. 3. The statutes of Oklahoma further provide: "The public schools of the State of Oklahoma shall be organized and maintained upon a complete plan of separation between the colored and white races, with impartial facilities for both races." (Laws 1949, P. 536, Art. 5, Sec. 1) Statutes, Supplement 1949, Art. 5, Title 70, Sec. 5-1).

The 1895 Constitution of South Carolina states, "separate schools shall be provided for children of the white and colored races and no child shall ever be permitted to attend the school provided for children of the other race." S. C. Const. 1895, Art. XIM, Sec. 7. Tennessee's Constitution of 1870 provides: "No school . . . shall allow white and Negro children to be received as scholars together in the same school." Tenn. Const. 1870, Art. XI, Sec. 12. Texas' Constitution of 1876 puts it thusly—"Separate schools shall be provided for white and colored children." Texas Const. 1876, Art. VII, Sec. 7. Virginia's 1902 Constitution says, "white and colored children shall not be taught in the same school." Va. Const. 1902, Art. IX, Sec. 140. Similarly, West Virginia as long ago as 1872, wrote into its Constitution that—"White and colored persons shall not be taught in the same school." W. Va. Const. 1872, Art. XIII, Sec. 8. The only exception to this use of mandatory language in the laws of the group of states where segregation is institutionalized is Maryland. In Maryland the language of the statutes is similar to the language used in the Acts of Congress, supra. Maryland laws provide: (a) "All white youths between the ages of six and twenty-one years shall be admitted into such public schools of the State . . ." An. Code Md. 1939, Art. 77, Sec. 111. (b) "it shall be the duty of the county board of education to establish one or more public schools in each election district for all colored youths between six and twenty-one years of age . . ." An. Code Md. 1939, Art. 77, Sec. 192. In other sections (193, 194, 195), provisions are made for administering "colored schools." Section 203 provides for colored industrial schools; Section 252, for a colored normal school for teachers. The compelling language used by the other southern states is absent. We request this Court to take judicial notice of the fact that under these statutes the Board of School Commissioners by a vote of 5 to 3 authorized the admission of a Negro student the last term to the white Polytechnic Institute of Baltimore, Maryland, without a law suit or legislative action. Admittedly, they did this because no similar provisions were available for Negroes, but likewise it is clear that they did not consider these Maryland laws any bar to their administrative action.

Thus, it appears that in the only one of these states where the laws are similar to those in the District of Columbia the language used there is not interpreted by school officials as compelling segregation.

In the District of Columbia no act of Congress attains the reach of the statutes just enumerated. Among the statutes of the District of Columbia there is none which requires or authorizes the exclusion of any Negro child from any school solely on the basis of race or color.

On April 16, 1862, slavery was abolished in the District of Columbia, 12 Stat. 376, Chapter LIV, Section 1. By virtue of Section 12 of the same act of the "black codes" of Maryland and Virginia were rendered inoperative in the District. Approximately one month later on May 21, 1862, effect was given to the Act of Congress, 12 Stat. 407, Chapter 83, which, inter alia, did two things: First, it undertook to give to Negroes at least some measure of participation in such public school educational opportunities as were then extant. And it is of utmost importance to remember that at that time public school education, qua public school education, was not universally accepted and was in an undeveloped, rudimentary condition. Secondly, this statute (section 4) struck down any vestiges of the black codes that may have been deemed to have survived the thrust and reach of the Act of April 16, 1862. Again it must be remembered that Congress paused in the midst of its war efforts to give some attention to education for the Negro—not addressing itself to the question of segregation at all, but merely to the problem of some education for the Negro.

Against this backdrop of social and political fabric, and without more, it seems to us to be clear that in this early period Congress not only did not issue respondents a grant of power to compel segregation in the schools of the District of Columbia, but did not even consider the matter. But there is more to be considered.

The Acts of 1862 merely provided that a special tax might be levied upon property "owned by persons of color, for the purpose of initiating a system of schools for colored children." Two years later in 1864 when a comprehensive statute of public schools was enacted which for the first time made attendance at school for District children compulsory it contained no express pronouncement that white and colored children shall not be educated together or that the school managers could compel a Negro child to attend a "Negro school." Congress wrote "it shall be the duty of the school board to provide suitable and convenient houses or rooms for holding schools for colored children." The Act further provided—"Any white resident shall be privileged to place his or her child or ward at any one of the schools provided for the education of white children in said portion of the District he or she may think proper to elect, with the consent of the school board; and any colored resident shall have the same rights with respect to colored schools." Patently this language is pitched in terms of privilege and of "may". These are not words of compulsion to attend segregated school facilities. Furthermore, this language of privilege was addressed to choices of whites for white schools and Negroes for Negro schools and made no reference to choice of Negroes or whites for mixed schools. It is apparent that facing an existing situation of schools being operated by charity and philanthropy Congress desired that Negroes should also benefit from any publicly appropriated funds. A search of the subsequent statutes on public education in the District of Columbia reveals no language, sounding in restraint of the citizenry, which rises above that just quoted, and upon which it appears subsequent statutes are bottomed. Our position bluntly stated is that such language does not in clear and unmistakable terms grant to the school board the power to compel Negro children and white children to be educated separately.

At most they can be said only to permit a voluntary segregation of the Pupils on the Basis of Race.

Asserting as we do that the education statutes do not compel segregation the most that we concede is that they permit a voluntary separation of races. The contemporaneous expressions of members of Congress in the decade beginning with the close of the Civil War add strong support for the assertion here made. This is so, not so much because of what was said by individual Senators and Congressmen for and against "mixed schools", but for the reason that the conflicting opinions on the subject at times apparently slanted in an effort to secure or prevent, as the case might be, passage of legislation designed to guarantee to the newly freed slaves a status commensurate with their new freedom, demonstrated that there was in fact no crystallyzed intent to compel segregated schools. In fact some Congressmen felt Negroes and whites could go to school together in the District. Speaking of the Civil Rights Act of 1875, which he supported, Senator Pratt of Indiana observed that Congress was continuing separate schools in the District of Columbia because both races were content with them; and at the same time he pointed out that where they were very few colored students, they would have to be intermingled.[1] We think Senator Frelinghuysen's statement should be taken as indicative of the most distant point on the road toward a concept of segregation in schools generally which the Congress as a Congress actually reached. On April 29, 1874, in making a speech to explain the bill denominated S. No. 1 (a Civil Rights Bill) Senator Frelinghuysen said:

> "When in a school district there are two schools, and the white children choose to go to one and the colored to the other, there is nothing in this bill that prevents their doing so . . . I believe that this vountary division into separate schools would often be the solution of the difficulty in communities where there still lingers a prejudice," Cong. Rec., 43rd Congress, 1st Sess. p. 3451.

Again in regard to segregated schools as a generic proposition, it is significant, we think, to note the action of Representative Hereford of West Virginia taken by him on March 11, 1872, and the reaction of the House of Representatives to it. On that day Representative Hereford asked for unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

> "Whereas it is one of the fundamental principles of our form of government that Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed: Therefore,
> Be It Resolved, That it would be contrary to the Constitution and a tyrannical usurpation of power for Congress to force mixed schools upon the states, and equally unconstitutional and tyrannical for Congress to pass any law interfering with churches, public carriers, or innkeepers, such subjects of legislation belonging of right to the states respectively."

Upon objection by Congressman Pierce, Congressman Hereford moved that the rules be suspended and the resolution adopted. His motion was voted down.

Turning again to the local scene as historically laid in the formative and fundamental period from 1805 to 1875 we see that the colored children of the District of Columbia were not included among the beneficiaries of public schools in any legislation either by the Congress or the City Council prior to the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, April 16, 1862. Wilson, J. Ormond, "Eighty Years of the Public Schools of Washington—1805 to 1885", Records of the Columbia Historical Society, Vol. 1, pp. 119-122. The National Government gave nothing for the maintenance of schools in the District until 1878; the support was derived from the people of the District by gifts and taxation and the revenue from lotteries. Report of the Board of Education to the Commissioner of the District of Columbia, 1904-1905, p. 56. As to the public education for the benefit of whites it has been said that up to 1844, "The city authorities had not yet come to realize the necessity of a free public school system for all children, and the free schools were in reality charity schools . . . " Dodd, Government of the District of Columbia (Byrne & Co. 1909) p. 226. A public school system free to all pupils was not established until 1848, when all tuition requirements were abolished. Ibid at p. 226. Annual taxes were first imposed in 1848, Ibid, p. 226.

Public education in the District of Columbia was in this embryonic stage of development when slavery was abolished here in 1862.

However since 1807, there had been schools receiving Negro pupils, a number of which schools were mixed. Special report of the Commissioner of Education on the Conditions and Improvement of Public Schools in the District of Columbia (GPO: 1871), p. 222; Dabney, pp. 1-22.

Of course, these schools were supported privately. The school legislation of 1862, 1864 and 1868 merely amounted to the giving of some public aid to this then existing system of private education of colored people, Special Report, supra, pp. 252-254. Again, we point out, no intent to compel segregation is evident.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The first public school for colored was not opened until March 1864, and it was opened in a private church. The first publicly owned school house for colored was not acquired until 1865, and was only made possible by private philanthropy, Special Report, supra, 254. This no doubt is the genesis of the statutory provision authorizing the school officials to receive donations for colored schools, while nothing is said about donations as to white schools. The various aid societies provided, by and large, the teachers and equipment for the schools, later operated by the Board of Trustees for colored schools.

> "These schools, which began in the Ebenezer church in a single room, with two teachers, in March, 1864, and in the spring of 1865 moved into the first school house built for public schools in the District, were increased by the Aid societies to four schools and as many teachers in 1866, and to five schools with seven teachers of the last named year, the Trustees commenced their school year with 31 teachers, four more being soon added, making for nearly the whole of that year 35 teachers, while through the winter and spring months the number was 41, the Aid societies furnishing at the same time 28, making a total of 69 teachers." Special Report, supra, p. 254.

In addition the management and control of these publicly supported schools, unlike the other public schools placed under the management of the local municipal governing bodies, were placed under the Secretary of the Interior, Act of July 11, 1862, 12 Stat. 537, Chap. 151.

The fact that there was in existence a public school system operated, maintained and controlled by the local municipal government, to which white pupils were admitted while there was this essentially philanthropic arrangement by the federal government for colored pupils, no doubt served as the basis for the general public and private confusion and doubt as to whether Negroes were or were not entitled to be accommodated in the same local public schools to which whites were admitted.

Indeed indecision is the hallmark of this matter and we submit that authority here claimed does not measure up to the test of clear and unmistakable delegation of power of restraint required by Ex Parte Endo, supra. Proceeding to a more intimate view of actual conduct, we find that in November of 1869 a Negro pupil, the daughter of the Reverend Mr. Stella Martin, a Negro minister, prominent in the public education movement, was admitted to a "white" school, Daily Morning Chronicle, Friday, November 6, 1869. This action admitting the Martin girl to the white school was challenged and a ruling requested from the corporation counsel's office as to the legality of the action. The Office of the corporation counsel sustained the right of this colored child to remain in the "white" school, Daily Morning Chronicle, December 1, 1869.[2]

In the latter part of 1869 and in 1870 resolutions were submitted to the Board of Aldermen and to the Board of Common Council of Washington seeking to have the "Board of Trustees of Public Schools" make no distinction on account of "race or color" in the admission of children to the schools under their jurisdiction.[3] And on April 25,

2 Quoting from Opinion of William E. Cook, Attorney for City of Washington:

"Obviously, the rule makes the judgment of a single trustee, and not the views or avowals of a parent or of any other person, conclusive as to the suitableness of a candidate; and if that judgment correct or erroneous, is favorable to the applicant, a ticket must be granted. It cannot be withheld; and when it is issued the holder, not ex gratia, but dejure, may demand admission to the school designated in it.

Hence, when the child referred to by you was furnished, by "one of your number," with a ticket in the usual form, or in accordance with the cited rule, its qualifications as to a scholar were regularly and definitely determined, and, on presenting the ticket in its possession to the teacher to whom it was addressed, eo instanti, it became entitled to admission into "her school." The teacher could not reject or repel the child, or refuse to receive and consider it as a scholar. And neither the laws of Congress, nor the ordinances of the city, nor the "by-laws" of the Board of Trustees authorize or permit it to be classified as a "visitor", or to be temporarily suspended, or to be deprived in these modes of the rights and privileges conferred on it by the ticket of admission. Unless, therefore, the child is expelled from the school for a violation of existing rules or regulations, or removed from it by paramount legal authority, if any exists, it must be allowed to remain as a pupil and in all respects be regarded and treated as such."

1870, a joint resolution of the Board of Common Council of Washington, unanimously passed, memorialized Congress to reorganize the public schools in the District of Columbia and to give the District "one common school system in which all children can be educated regardless of their color, to be governed by one Board of Trustees."[4] The Board of Common Council was likewise memorialized to strike the word "white" wherever it occurred in the Act of November 12, 1858, or in any other laws relating to the public schools of the City of Washington (Journal of the 67th Council pp. 1474-1475).[5]

We submit that this contemporaneous construction of the powers of the school managers in terms of actual conduct and the efforts made to have a clear cut Congressional pronouncement of a common education system are of extreme significance in deciding whether or not integrated schools were interdicted by Congress. It is submitted that this doubt still exists today for the reason that Congress has taken no specific action since that time to resolve the existing doubt, inherent in the language of these Acts and embedded in this historical background.

Finally when it is considered that it is the Congress of the United States whose intentions we are considering—a Congress which has since 1860 (omitting the educational statutes)[6] enacted no law conditioning the enjoyment of a right in the District of Columbia solely on the basis of race or color, but on the contrary has in every law since that date acted in aid of removal of such racial distinctions in the realm of governmental action in the District of Columbia, it would appear to be an irresistible conclusion that Congress did not intend in this one area of education alone to compel racial distinctions.

C.

An Interpretation by This Court That These Acts of Congress Compel the Segregation of Pupils in the District of Columbia Solely on the Basis of Race or Color Alone Would Render Them Unconstitutional (Answer to Question 3 of the Court).

SUCH AN INTERPRETATION WOULD VIOLATE THE DUE PROCESS CLAUSE OF THE FIFTH AMENDMENT.

This Is a Case of First Impression in This Court.

The question which the instant case raises, whether the Federal Government in providing educational opportunities for pupils in the District of Columbia has power under the Constitution and laws of the United States to segregate pupils solely by the basis of race or color, has never been presented to this Court before. The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit had this question presented to it in only one other case, Carr v. Corning, supra, and that court there decided that these Acts of Congress, supra, compelled segregation in the District of Columbia and that compulsory separation of races in public education was constitutional. The court below relied upon the holding in the Carr case in dismissing petitioners' complaint.

The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit has had before it only three cases dealing with the question of race distinctions in the provisions for opportunities for public education in the District of Columbia. The first case was Wall v. Oyster, 36 App. D. C. 50 (1910). In that case, petitioner, a resident of the District of Columbia of school age, questioned her classification as a Negro for purposes of assignment to a particular school. The court, in deciding that question, stated that compulsory segregation of the races was constitutional in the District of Columbia. Petitioner having conceded that point, and having based her case upon a lack of standards for the determination of race, and upon a failure to provide a hearing upon this determination, the issue before the court was whether or not proper standards had been set and a proper hearing provided for. There was no issue before the court as to whether or not the government possesed the power to make the classification. Therefore, that decision is of little value in determining the question posed in the instant case and was not relied upon by the Court of Appeals in the Carr case for this purpose.

The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit first faced the question of the power of the Federal Government to segregate Negroes from whites in providing opportunities for public education in the District of Columbia in Carr v. Corning, and Browne v. Magdeburger, supra.

The court consolidated for argument and decision these two cases. The Browne complaint did not present the question of the constitutionality of the separation of the races in public education; however, the Carr complaint did. The Court of Appeals held, at page 175:

> "It is urged that the separation of the races is itself, apart from equality or inequality of treatment, forbidden by the Constitution. The question thus posed is whether the Constitution lifted this problem out of the hands of all legislatures and settled it. We do not think it did."

The court concluded on this point that the makers of the first ten Amendments in 1789 or of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1866 did not mean to prohibit the legislature from providing separate schools. The court examined the chronology of statutes relating to the separate school system in the District of Columbia and concluded that the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment intended to provide separate school facilities for the races in the District of Columbia.

Petitioners have already shown why they do not agree with the opinion of the court below that these Acts of Congress, supra, compel segregation. But, even if petitioners are wrong and, these Acts of Congress do compel segregation, these Acts are unconstitutional and the Carr case was wrongly decided. The majority failed to meet and deal with the fundamental question raised by Judge Edgerton's dissent. It is submitted that before any reliance can be placed upon the conclusion reached by the majority in the Carr case the following argument of Judge Edgerton at page 192 must first be answered—

> "Appellees say that Congress requires them to maintain segregation. The President's Committee concluded that congressional legislation 'assumes the fact of segregation but nowhere makes it mandatory'. I think the question irrelevant, since legislation cannot affect appellant's constitutional rights."

The Court of Appeals was so preoccupied in the Carr case with the history and background of the Fourteenth Amendment, and with the legal theories underlying the separate but equal doctrine, and was so convinced by the record in which the lower court had found evidence showing equality of facilities, that its opinion that the action of the School Board was constitutional is of doubtful value in the instant case. Here the sole question is as to the constitutional power of the school officials to deny minor petitioners admission to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color. Here there is no question of equality of facilities. This view is supported by the opinion of the Court of Appeals, especially where it is observed that Judge Clark concurred in the majority opinion although he considered the cases moot and to have been properly dismissed, since the factual basis for the actions was the double shift at Browne Junior High School at the time the actions were brought, and since the double shift had been eliminated prior to the action.

Therefore, whichever interpretation is placed upon these Acts of Congress, respondents are still limited in their power to deny minor petitioners admission to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color by the Constitution and laws of the United States, which limitations should be determined by this Court.

Respondents' Actions in Regulating and Administering the Educational System of the District of Columbia Pursuant to and Under Color of Congressional Authority Are Limited by the Provisions of the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment.

Article I, Section 8, Clause 17, of the Constitution of the United States grants to Congress the power "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever" over the District of Columbia. Pursuant to this power, Congress by legislation has provided a system of education for the District of Columbia and acting pursuant to and under color of this legislation respondents regulate and administer said system of education. Congressional legislation providing the system of education and the acts of respondents in regulating and administering the educational system of the District of Columbia, beyond question, are subject to the limitations of the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. In Capital Traction Company v. Hof, 174 U. S. 1, 5 (1899) this Court observed:

> "The Congress of the United States, being empowered by the Constitution 'to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever' over the seat of the National Government, has the entire control over the District of Columbia for every purpose of government, national or local. It may exercise within the District all legislative powers that the legislature of a State might exercise within the State; . . . so long as it does not contravene any provision of the Constitution of the United States."

In Callen v. Wilson, 127 U. S. 540, 550 (1888), this Court observed:

". . . There is nothing in the history of the Constitution or of the original amendments to justify the assertion that the people of this District may be lawfully deprived of the benefit of any of the constitutional guarantees of life, liberty and property . . ."

One of the constitutional guarantees, the benefit of which petitioners may not lawfully be deprived, is that as citizens no distinctions be made between them and other citizens because of race or color alone.

This Court, in Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U. S. 81, 100, (1943) said:

"Distinctions between citizens solely because of their ancestry are by their very nature odious to a free people whose institutions are founded upon the doctrine of equality. For that reason, legislative classification or discrimination based on race alone has often been held to be a denial of equal protection . . ."

In that same case, in a concurring opinion where this Court upheld the deprivation of the liberty of 70,000 Japanese under a war-time curfew law, Mr. Justice Murphy said at page 111:

". . . The result is the creation in this country of two classes of citizens for the purposes of a critical and perilous hour—to sanction discrimination between groups of United States citizens on the basis of ancestry. In my opinion this goes to the very brink of constitutional power.

"Except under conditions of great emergency a regulation of this kind applicable solely to citizens of a particular racial extraction would not be regarded as in accord with the requirement of due process of law contained in the Fifth Amendment. We have consistently held that attempts to apply regulatory action > to particular groups solely on the basis of racial distinction or classification is not in accordance with due process of law as prescribed by the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments . . ."

BLEED THROUGH

Another constitutional guarantee, of which minor petitioners may not lawfully be deprived, is the right to go to Sousa Junior High School without any limitations based solely upon race or color.

Mr. Justice Murphy, in a concurring opinion in Ex Parte Endo, 323 U. S. 283, 308 (1944), said:

> ". . . For the Government to suggest under these circumstances that the presence of Japanese blood in a loyal American citizen might be enough to warrant her exclusion from a place where she would otherwise have a right to go is a position I cannot sanction."

In the instant case minor petitioners would have a right to go to Sousa Junior High School but for respondents' action in excluding them solely because of their race or color, an action forbidden by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment.

Final determination of what constitutes due process of law is for the judiciary, not Congress. Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. v. U. S. 298 U. S. 349, 364, 5, 7 (1938).

Fundamental Rights With Respect to Education Are Protected by the Fifth Amendment Against Arbitrary Governmental Restrictions.

The right of a parent to direct the education of his child is a fundamental right firmly embedded in American jurisprudence. This Court has recognized that this right includes liberty of choice of parents and their children in the selection of the type of education which parents and their children think important. Farrington v. Tokushige, 273 U. S. 284 (1926); Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U. S. 510 (1924); Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U. S. 390 (1922).

This Court, in the cases above cited, has affirmed that educational rights of parents and their children, including their liberty of choice, are protected by the Federal Constitution from arbitrary governmental restrictions.

This Court held in Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U. S. 390, 399, 400 (1923), that:

> "While this Court has not attempted to define with exactness the liberty thus guaranteed, the term has received much consideration and some of the included things have been definitely stated. Without doubt, it denotes not merely freedom from bodily restraint but also the right of the individual to contract, to engage in any of the common occupations of life, to acquire useful knowledge, to marry, establish a home and bring up children, to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and generally to enjoy those privileges long recognized at common law as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men. . . . The established doctrine is that this liberty may not be interfered with, under the guise of protecting the public interest, by legislative action which is arbitrary or without reasonable relation to some purpose within the competency of the State to effect. Determination by the legislature of what constitutes proper exercise of police power is not final or conclusive but is subject to supervision by the courts." (Emphasis supplied)

Again in Meyer v. Nebraska, supra, at page 400, this Court stated:

> "The American people have always regarded education and acquisition of knowledge as matters of supreme importance which should be diligently promoted. . . . Corresponding to the right of control, it is the natural duty of the parent to give his children education suitable to their station in life; and nearly all the States, . . . enforce this obligation by compulsory laws."

In Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U. S. 510, 534-5 (1925), this Court held:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> "Under the doctrine of Meyer v. Nebraska . . . we think it entirely plain that the Act of 1922 unreasonably interferes with the liberty of parents and guardians to direct the upbringing and education of children under their control. As often heretofore pointed out, rights guaranteed by the Constitution may not be abridged by legislation which has no reasonable relation to some purpose within the competency of the State. The fundamental theory of liberty upon which all governments in this Union repose excludes any general power of the State to standardize its children by forcing them to accept instruction from public teachers only. The child is not the mere creature of the State; those who nurture him and direct his destiny have the right, coupled with the high duty, to recognize and prepare him for additional obligations."

Meyer v. Nebraska and Pierce v. Society of Sisters involved the protection given to educational rights by the Fourteenth Amendment against unreasonable or arbitrary State restrictions. It is clear, however, that these rights are similarly protected by the Fifth Amendment from unreasonable or arbitrary Federal restrictions.

In Farrington v. Tokushige, 273 U. S. 284, 298, 299 (1927), this Court said:

> "Enforcement of the Act probably would destroy most, if not all, of them; and, certainly, it would deprive parents of fair opportunity to procure for their children instruction which they think important and we cannot say is harmful. The Japanese parent has the right to direct the education of his own child without unreasonable restrictions; the Constitution protects him as well as those who speak another tongue. . . . "The general doctrine touching rights guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment to owners, parents, and children in respect of attendance upon schools has been announced in recent opinions. Meyer v. Nebraska, . . . Bartels v. Iowa, . . . Pierce v. Society of Sisters . . . While that amendment declares that no State shall 'deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law,' the inhibition of the Fifth Amendment—'no person shall . . . be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law'—applies to the federal government and agencies set up by Congress . . . Those fundamental rights of the individual which the cited cases declared were protected by the Fourteenth Amendment from infringement by the States are guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment against action by the Territorial Legislature or officers."

Courts have indicated a respect for opinion of legal scholars and teachers: See: Georgetown College v. Hughes, 130 F. (2d) 810 (1942). With this in mind, petitioners call attention of the Court to the brief of the Committee of law professors, at pages 36-38, filed as Brief, Amicus Curiae in the Supreme Court of the United States, Sweatt v. Painter, et al., No. 44, October Term, 1949, from which we quote in part:

"(1) A democratic society, like any other, seeks to transmit its cultural heritage, traditions and aspirations from generation to generation. While there are many instruments of transmission of culture—the family, the church, business, institutions, political and social groups and the schools—in our society the school seems to have emerged as the most important . . .

"(2) Just as the principle of free public education was the first important step in realizing democratic objectives through our educational system, so completely non-segregated public education is an essential element in reaching that goal. If children have race superiority taught them as infants, we cannot expect them lightly to toss it aside in later life. The answer lies not, however, in simply indoctrinating them with the principle of racial equality. . . . 'Education in America must be education for democracy. If education is life and growth, then it must be life within a social group. . . . Schools must be democratic communities wherein children live natural, democratic lives with their companions and grow into adulthood with good citizenship a part of their experience.'

"(3) This modern educational theory of learning by doing, clearly implies the necessity of non-segregated education. The principle of equality of opportunity regardless of race or creed, so much a part of our American tradition, can be fully achieved only if this element in our cultural heritage is kept alive and allowed to grow. The school, as has been shown, is the most important institution through which this heritage can be transmitted. But, as has likewise been made clear, proper teaching of the principle of equality of opportunity requires more than mere inculcation of the democratic ideal. What is essential is the opportunity at least in the school, to practice it. This requires that the school make possible continuous actual experience of harmonious cooperation between members of various ethnic and religious groups and thus produce attitudes of tolerance and mutual sharing that will continue in later life. In the segregated school, this desirable environment does not exist. The most important instrument for teaching democracy to all people is thus rendered impotent."

Educational rights are not immune from all governmental interference, but it is submitted that the educational rights asserted by Petitioners have been judicially determined to be fundamental rights. As such, every governmental interference with, or restriction upon them, when properly challenged as arbitrary, must affirmatively be shown to be reasonable, otherwise they violate the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. The relevant decisions of this Court demonstrate that when governmental interference with fundamental educational rights and liberties are challenged as arbitrary, the burden is cast upon the government imposing the restrictions to demonstrate the reasonableness of the restrictions.

Farrington v. Tokushige, supra, involved an Act of the legislature of Hawaii which was challenged as violative of the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. The Act imposed severe limitations on the operation of so-called "foreign language schools" in Hawaii, and in this Court's judgment, denied to parents "reasonable choice and discretion in respect of teachers, curriculum and textbooks", and deprived "parents of fair opportunity to procure for their children instruction which they think important." This Court did not hold that private-supported schools are not subject to government regulation, but it did hold that regulations restricting educational rights and liberties of parents and pupils must be justified as reasonable. The challenged regulation was held to violate the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment, because it restricted liberty of choice with respect to education without adequate reason. The government's contention that the regulations were "necessary for the public welfare" was not an adequate reason.

In Farrington v. Tokushige, supra, this Court made express reference to "the general doctrine touching rights guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment to owners, parents and children in respect of attendanc upon schools" as announced in Meyer v. Nebraska, supra, and Pierce v. Society of Sisters, supra, and expressly held that this general doctrine is to be applied to educational rights protected by the Fifth Amendment, against arbitrary federal action.

This general doctrine touching educational rights protected by the due process clauses of the Fifth, and also the Fourteenth Amendments, is revealed by an examination of this Court's unanimous opinions in the cases relied upon.

The cornerstone of this doctrine is revealed to be the fundamental and, therefore, constitutionally protected right and duty of parents to direct and control the upbringing and education of their children. This right includes not only the right of pupils to "acquire useful knowledge". (Meyer v. Nebraska, supra, at page 399) but the parents' liberty of choice as to the type of school, selection of courses, and teachers. (Meyer v. Nebraska, supra, at pages 400-401; Pierce v. Society of Sisters, supra, at page 535; Farrington v. Tokushige, supra, at page 298).

The doctrine protects the rights thus described and defined, including liberty of choice, against all arbitrary governmental restrictions. (Meyer v. Nebraska, supra, at page 401; Pierce v. Society of Sisters, supra, at page 535). These educational rights are protected against arbitrary restrictions imposed "under the guise of protecting the public interest." (Meyer v. Nebraska, supra, at page 400).

The doctrine recognizes that whenever a governmental restriction is properly challenged as arbitrary, "determination by the legislature as to what constitutes proper exercise of police power is not final or conclusive, but is subject to supervision by the courts." (Meyer v. Nebraska, supra, at page 400); and the burden is cast upon the government imposing the restriction, to demonstrate that there is "adequate reason" for the challenged restriction (Farrington v. Tokushige, supra, at page 298; Pierce v. Society of Sisters, supra, at page 534; Meyer v. Nebraska, supra, at page 402). Moreover, the challenged restriction must be shown to be reasonably related to a purpose within the competency of the government. (Meyer v. Nebraska, supra, at page 403; Pierce v. Society of Sisters, supra, at page 535).

Governmental action restricting educational rights and liberties by prescribed courses of instruction, to be justified, must be shown to be reasonably related to the promotion of the intelligence of the body politic. In Meyer v. Nebraska, supra, this Court held that a statute prohibiting the teaching of "any language other than the English Language" to pupils below the eighth grade, unreasonably restricted educational liberties protected by due process. The statute was not justified, because its purpose was to prevent the acquisition of knowledge of foreign language rather than to promote intelligence—thus an unauthorized purpose. In addition, this Court held that the restriction was "without reasonable relation to any end within the competency of the State." (Emphasis supplied).

It is generally agreed that the promotion of the general intelligence of the body politic is so essential to the development and progress and even the very existence of democratic government, that education is a proper governmental function. To that end the states and the federal government have established and maintain systems of public education. In addition, the Federal Government and the states may make the education of children compulsory. Such a limitation on the fundamental educational right to liberty of choice must be justified, and is justified by showing that it is within the competency of the Government to require a parent to perform the duty he owes to his child and to his government, to educate his child.

However, compulsory attendance laws may not arbitrarily restrict liberty of choice as to schools. In Pierce v. Society of Sisters, supra, this Court held violative of due process a statute which compelled every child, for a prescribed period, to attend the public schools exclusively. This Court concluded that the purpose of the challenged statute was the standardization of children "by forcing them to accept instruction from public teachers only". Such a purpose was held to be excluded by the "fundamental theory of liberty upon which all governments in this Union repose". This Court again pointed out that "rights guaranteed by the Constitution may not be abridged by legislation which has no reasonable relation to some purpose within the competency of the state."

In Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U. S. 624 (1943) this Court enjoined the enforcement of a state law compelling patriotic observance on the part of public school pupils. In that case a majority of this Court held that the purpose of this restriction on educational rights, was to compel the flag salute and pledge of allegiance, and that such a purpose was beyond the competency of Government. The Barnette decision overruled the earlier decision of this Court in Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U. S. 586 (1940) which held, among other things, that "promotion of national cohesion" was a lawful governmental purpose and that compelling public school pupils to salute the flag was reasonably related to this lawful purpose.

In Zucht v. King, 260 U. S. 174 (1922), a city ordinance making vaccination a prerequisite to school attendance was challenged as violative of due process. This Court upheld the ordinance; such a restriction on educational rights is justified both because the preservation of public health is recognized as an "adequate reason", and because making vaccination a prerequisite to school attendance is reasonably related to the preservation of public health.[6a]

Governmental Restrictions Based on Race or Color Alone, Are Presumptively Arbitrary.

This Court said, speaking through Mr. Justice Black in Korematsu v. U. S., 323 U. S. 214, 216, (1944)—

> "It should be noted, to begin with, that all legal restrictions which curtail the civil rights of a single racial group are immediately suspect. That is not to say that all such restrictions are unconstitutional. It is to say that courts must subject them to the most rigid scrutiny. Pressing public necessity may sometimes justify the existence of such restrictions; racial antagonism never can." (Emphasis supplied.)

That "pressing public necessity" must be more than the possibility of racial conflicts resulting from racial antagonism alone, is made clear in this Court's opinion in Ex Parte Endo, supra, at pages 302-303 wherein this Court points out that no authority existed for the detention of an admittedly loyal citizen of Japanese ancestry simply because of "community hostility." This court said:

> "Community hostility even to loyal evacuees may have been (and perhaps still is) a serious problem. But if authority for their custody and supervision is > to be sought on that ground, the Act . . . and Executive Order offer no support. And none other is advanced."

[6a] School regulations relating to scholarship and fitness of applicants, residence, age, sex, textbooks and courses of study, transportation, membership in fraternities and sororities, may restrict educational rights. Where such regulations are reasonably related to a recognized educational purpose or some purpose within the competency of the government responsible for such regulations, they have been upheld by the courts.

In Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60 (1917), this Court invalidated a city ordinance requiring residential segregation. To the contention that the ordinance was for the promotion of public peace by preventing race conflicts; the Court said:

> "Desirable as this is, and important as is the preservation of the public peace, this aim cannot be accomplished by laws or ordinances which deny rights created or protected by the Federal Constitution." 245 U. S. 60, 81.

In Hirabayashi v. United States, supra, Korematsu v. United States, supra, and Ex Parte Endo, supra, this Court has evolved certain definite standards by which government enforced racial distinctions between citizens must be tested when properly challenged as violative of the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. These standards are in accord with the earlier decisions of this Court in Meyer v. Nebraska, supra, Pierce v. Society of Sisters, supra, and Farrington v. Tôkushige, supra, in which restrictions on educational rights were struck down as arbitrary and therefore violative of due process.

1. The restrictions must be justified by an affirmative showing of peculiar circumstances, present emergency, or pressing public necessity.

(a) In Meyer v. Nebraska, supra, this Court invalidated a Nebraska statute restricting the teaching of foreign languages, as infringing educational rights protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. At page 402 the Court said:

> "The interference is plain enough and no adequate reason therefor in time of peace and domestic tranquility has been shown."

(b) In Farrington v. Tokushige, supra, this Court invalidated an Act of the Legislature of Hawaii restricting the operation of foreign language schools, as infringing educational rights protected by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. At page 298, this Court said:

> "Apparently all are parts of a deliberate plan to bring foreign language schools under a strict governmental control for which the record discloses no adequate reason."

In Hirabayashi v. U. S., supra, this Court upheld a military order confining Japanese-Americans to their homes at night as not infringing on the liberty of persons protected by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. At page 101, this Court said:

> "Our investigation here does not go beyond the inquiry whether, in the light of all the relevant circumstances preceding and attending their promulgation, the challenged orders and statute afforded a reasonable basis for the action taken in imposing the curfew."

Again at page 108, Mr. Justice Douglas concurring said:

> "Detention for a reasonable cause is one thing. Detention on account of ancestry is another."

(d) In Korematsu v. U. S., supra, this Court upheld a military order excluding Japanese-Americans from a military area as not infringing on the liberty protected by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment.

Again at page 218, this Court said:

> "True, exclusion from the area in which one's home is located is a far greater deprivation than constant confinement to the home from 8 P. M. to 6 A. M. Nothing short of apprehension by the proper military authorities of the gravest imminent danger to the public safety can constitutionally justify either."

In the instant case, no reason is given in justification of the restriction on the educational rights of petitioners.

The only apparent reason is the race or color of petitioners, a reason sternly interdicted by this Court.

2. The restrictions must be for a purpose which government has authority to effect.

(a) In Pierce v. Society of Sisters, supra, this Court invalidated a state statute the purpose of which was "to compel general attendance at public schools by normal children, between eight and sixteen." (page 531) In concluding that the State had no authority to effect this purpose, this Court said at page 535:

> "The fundamental theory of liberty upon which all governments in this Union repose excludes any general power of the State to standardize its children by forcing them to accept instruction from public teachers only."

In the instant case the apparent purpose of the action of respondents complained of, is, as to public education in the District of Columbia, to compel Negroes to attend only schools attended by Negroes and to accept instruction by Negro teachers only. It is submitted that the Federal Government has no authority to effect such a purpose.

3. The restrictions must be clearly authorized and if implied authority is relied upon it must appear that the restriction is clearly and unmistakably indicated by the language used in granting the authority.

(b) In Ex Parte Endo, supra, this Court invalidated the detention in a Relocation Center of a loyal Japanese-American because no authority to detain was expressly granted or necessarily implied. At page 297 this Court said:

> "We are of the view that Mitsye Endo should be given her liberty. In reaching that conclusion we do not come to the underlying constitutional issues which have been argued. For we conclude that, whatever power the War Relocation Authority may have to detain other classes of citizens, it has no authority to subject citizens who are concededly loyal to its leave procedure."

At page 300, it is said:

"We must assume, when asked to find implied powers in a grant of legislative or executive authority, that the law makers intended to place no greater restraint on the citizen than was clearly and unmistakably indicated by the language they used."

Again at page 300 this Court said:

"Their single aim was the protection of the war effort against espionage and sabotage. It is in light of that one objective that the powers conferred by the orders must be construed."

And at page 300, 301, this Court points out

"Neither the Act nor the orders use the language of detention . . . and at page 301, 302 we do not mean to imply that detention in connection with no phase of the evacuation program would be lawful. The fact that the Act and the orders are silent on detention does not of course mean that any power to detain is lacking. Some such power might indeed be necessary to the successful operation of the evacuation program. At least we may so assume. Moreover, we may assume for the purpose of this case that initial detention in Relocation Centers was authorized. But we stress the silence of the legislative history and of the Act and the Executive Orders on the power to detain to emphasize that any such authority which exists must be implied. If there is to be the greatest possible accommodation of the liberties of the citizen with this war measure, any such implied power must be narrowly confined to the precise purpose of the evacuation program."

In the instant case it is clear therefore that the respondents have no express authority to exclude minor petitioners from Sousa Junior High School solely because of their race or color. No language of exclusion is found in any Congressional Acts relating to public education in the District of Columbia. It is to be assumed that these Acts were passed for educational purposes and objectives. It is submitted that no legitimate educational purpose is served by the classification and distinction of pupils solely on the basis of race or color and the exclusion of minor petitioners from Sousa Junior High School by respondents solely because of race or color. On the contrary, there is abundant authority for the proposition that governmentally enforced racial segregation is in conflict with educational purposes and objectives in our democratic society.

4. The restrictions must have a reasonable relation to an authorized purpose within the competency of the government to effect.

In Hirabayashi v. U. S., supra, Mr. Justice Douglas said in his concurring opinion at page 106:

> "Where the orders under the present Act have some relation to 'protection against espionage and against sabotage' our task is at an end."

In Korematsu v. U. S., supra, this Court said at page 218:

> "But exclusion from a threatened area, no less than curfew, has a definite and close relationship to the prevention of espionage and sabotage."

In the instant case, the exclusion of minor petitioners from Sousa Junior High School solely because of race or color has no reasonable relation to any educational purpose suggested by respondents, for they have suggested no purpose. It is submitted that no purpose, within the competency of the government to effect can be advanced in this case.

The Action of Respondents, Challenged by Petitioners, Arbitrarily Restricts Educational Rights of Petitioners in Violation of the Fifth Amendment.

Briefly stated, the action of respondents, in refusing to admit minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School solely because of the race and color of petitioners, is a restriction on the educational rights of minor petitioners to acquire the type of education they desire and which is offered by the government for the District of Columbia. Moreover, the actions of respondents complained of restricts the liberty of choice of petitioners who are parents of minor petitioners in their selection of the type of education and teachers offered by the government of the District of Columbia. The existence of compulsory school laws with criminal sanctions enforceable by respondents serves to emphasize the reality of the restrictions.

The purpose of the challenged restrictions is plain. It is to compel petitioners who desire to avail themselves of the public education offered by the government of the District of Columbia, to receive such education with members of their race only, and only from teachers who are members of their race.

It is respectfully submitted that this attempt by the respondents to classify citizens on the basis of race alone, for the purposes of public education in the District of Columbia, is an arbitrary restriction on constitutionally protected educational rights; and that such restrictions violate the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment under the general doctrine enunciated by this Court touching rights guaranteed by the due process clause to parents and children in respect of attendance upon schools.

At the threshold, there is serious question as to whether the challenged restrictions are authorized.

Should this Court decide that the challenged restrictions are authorized, the limitations to such a holding enunciated by this Court require a showing that there is "adequate reason" for the challenged restrictions.

This Court has never yet recognized any reason as adequate to validate any purely racial restrictions on fundamental educational rights protected by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. Moreover, this Court has decried the use of race alone as the basis for classifying citizens for any purpose, and has held racial classifications valid under the Fifth Amendment only where the War Power of the Federal Government was invoked and there was a reasonable relation between the racial classification and the temporary purpose of protecting the nation against the iminent threat of sabotage and espionage. Hirabayashi v. United States, supra; Korematsu v. United States, supra.

Moreover, where the temporary threat to national security was found not to exist, the racial restriction was held violative of due process. Ex parte Endo, supra.

Petitioners Sustain Injury as the Direct Result of the Action of Respondents in Excluding Minor Petitioners from Sousa Junior High School Solely Because of Race or Color.

The exclusion of minor petitioners from admission to Sousa Junior High School, solely because of race or color is a deprivation of petitioners' constitutional rights to acquire useful knowledge, to choose a particular public school, and to enjoy public educational opportunities without government enforced limitations or restrictions based solely on race or color. That injury continues and is not removed or even lessened by reason of the fact that minor petitioners "do now attend a junior high school in said District", allocated by respondents for the instruction of Negro children. Beyond question the deprivation of a constitutional right is injurious per se. See Cummings v. Missouri, 4

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Wall. 277, 320 (1866), where this Court observed that "liberty" includes "freedom from outrage on feelings as well as restraints on the person."

All of the injury shown by petitioners under the succeeding Point 2 of this brief, in reference to a Bill of Attainder supports the contentions here made. Any deprivation of a freedom of choice solely on the basis of race or color is violative of petitioners' civil rights and thus injurious. To be compelled to attend school because of the compulsory school law, D. C. Code 1951 Ed., Title 31, Secs. 201, 207, and then to be compelled to accept segregation on the basis of race or color and to have one's feelings outraged is injurious per se. The deprivation of a civil right is an injury. Giles v. Harris, 189 U. S. 475, 485 (1903).

Such An Interpretation Would Render These Acts Bills of Attainder.

Article I, Section 9, Clause 3 of the Constitution of the United States provides that—"No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed.[7]

The Board of Education of the District of Columbia took the position, which was confirmed in the Carr case, supra, and was relied upon by the Court in the case below, that the statutes enacted by Congress governing public schools in the District of Columbia compelled it to segregate Negroes from whites in the school system.

It is clear that, if respondents and the Court of Appeals in the Carr case are right in their interpretation then these statutes are Bills of Attainder, for they compel the exclusion of minor petitioners from Sousa Junior High School solely on account of their race or color, and they are in violation of Article 1, Section 9, Clause 3 of the Constitution of the United States, for:

[7] For historical background of bills of attainder in America and in England see Notes, 46 Col. L. Rev. 849, Notes, 21 Tulane L. Rev. 278, 2 Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States (5th Ed. 1891) 216, Adams, Constitutional History of England (1935) 228, Holdsworth, History of English Law (4th Ed. 1927) 381.

a. They are legislative or congressional statues.

b. They are directed at named or easily ascertainable persons—namely, Negroes.

c. They inflict punishment on these persons. This punishment is arbitrary.

d. They inflict punishment without a judicial trial.

e. They convict Negroes of the "crime" of being inferior by reason of birth, color and blood, or of being descendents of slaves.

These Are Acts of Congress and These Petitioners Are Easily Ascertainable Members of a Group.

It is obvious that these are Acts of Congress, and United States v. Lovett, 328 U. S. 303, 315-316 (1946), held "that legislative acts, no matter what their form, that apply either to named individuals or to easily ascertainable members of a group in such a way as to inflict punishment on them without a judicial trial are bills of attainder prohibited by the Constitution." Negro children certainly constitute an easily ascertainable group, especially since, under the rule of Wall v. Oyster, supra, the Board is empowered to determine race for itself, and may force pupils and their parents to accept that determination. Just as in the Lovett case, supra, the present case involves punishment without judicial trial, and determined by no previous law or fixed rule. A judicial trial would at least provide safeguards against arbitrary action which is inherent—if not implicit—in an administrative condemnation such as the Board of Education's segregation rule. United States v. Lovett, supra. According to this Court in Oyama v. California, 332 U. S. 633, 646 (1948), only exceptional circumstances can excuse racial discrimination by law, and such distinctions must be justified by the agency practicing the discrimination. This has never been done with respect to segregation in the public schools of the District of Columbia.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

There can be no doubt that segregation in our public schools is aimed at Negroes. Cf. Railroad Co. v. Brown, 17 Wall. 445, 452-453 (1873).

In Cummings v. Missouri, supra, at page 327, the Supreme Court declared: "The clauses in the Missouri constitution, which are the subject of consideration, do not, in terms define any crimes or declare that any punishment shall be inflicted, but they produce the same result upon the parties, against whom they are directed, as though the crimes were defined and the punishment was declared." This passage surely fits the position in which appellants are placed by appellees. What legislatures may not accomplish directly, they may not effect by indirection. Ex Parte Garland, 4 Wall, 333, 380 (1866); United States v. Lovett, supra. Neither may they act so as to secure by implication that which would be invalid if expressly provided. Oyama v. California, supra.

It is the function of the courts to protect citizens against discriminatory acts such as those presented in this case. Where else can one turn in the face of the disgrace and ignominy heaped upon petitioners by respondents? To paraphrase this Court in United States v. Lovett, supra, what is involved here is a proscription by the Board of Education of more than 50,000 Negro chilren, prohibiting their ever attending a school simultaneously occupied by white children. Were this case held not to be justiciable, Board action, aimed at a large, readily recognizable class, which stigmatized their ancestry and seriously impaired their chance to earn a living, could never be challenged in any court. Our Constitution did not contemplate such a result.

These Acts of Congress Inflict Punishment on Petitioners.

(1). Segregation is Punishment.

That segregation constitutes punishment is the conclusion reached by recognized authorities in the field of so-ciology, politics, psychology and law, from a consideration of the studies of segregation and its effects.

Gunnar Myrdal, who made a detailed and authoritative study of the entire problem posed by treatment of the Negro minority in the United States, pointed out that what was merely segregation forty years ago is becoming a caste system today. He continued: "The spiritual effects of segregation are accumulating with each new generation, continuously estranging the two groups." (1 Mydral, An American Dilemma, 645 (1944).

The process of development from segregation to caste system is described in Mac Iver, The More Perfect Union, 67-68 (1948):

> "Now let us consider more closely the manner in which the conditions that are confirmed or imposed by discrimination operate to sustain it. The discriminating group starts with an advantage. It has greater power, socially and politically, and usually it has a superior economic position. Thus it is enabled to discriminate. By discriminating it cuts the other group off from economic and social opportunities. The subordination of the lower group gives the upper group a new consciousness of its superiority. This psychological reinforcement of discrimination is in turn ratified by the factual evidences of inferiority that accompany the lack of opportunity, by the mean and miserable state of those who live and breed in poverty, who suffer constant frustration, who have no incentive to improve their lot, and who feel themselves to be outcasts of society. Thus discrimination evokes both attitudes and modes of life favorable to its perpetuation, not only in the upper group but to a considerable extent, in the lower group as well. A total upper caste complex congenial to discrimination, a complex of attitudes, interests, modes of living, and habits of power is developed and institutionalized, having as its counterpart a lower caste complex of modes of living, habits of subservience, and corresponding attitudes."

The effects of segregation upon the group segregated have recently been summarized in a note in 56 Yale L.J. 1059, 1061-2 (1947):

> "Every authority on psychology and sociology is agreed that the students subjected to discrimination and segregation are profoundly affected by this experience . . . Experience with segregation of Negroes has shown that adjustments may take the form of acceptance, avoidance, direct hostility and aggression, and indirect or deflected hostility. In seeking self-expression and finding it blocked by the practices of a society accepting segregation, the child may express hatred or rage which in turn may result in a distortion of normal social behavior by the creation of the defense mechanism of secrecy. The effects of a dual school system force a sense of limitations upon the child and destroy incentives, produce a sense of inferiority, give rise to mechanisms of escape in fantasy and discourage racial self-appreciation."

On the other side of the picture, "jim crow" laws, which govern important segments of everday living, not only indoctrinate both white and colored races with the caste conception, but they solidify the segregation existing outside those laws and give it respectability and institutional fixity. (Myrdal, An American Dilemma, pp. 579-580). See also Berger, The Supreme Court and Group Discrimination Since 1937, 49 Col. L. Rev. 201, 204-205. As the Supreme Court in California has pointedly said, the way to eradicate racial tension is not "through the perpetuation by law of the prejudices that give rise to the tension." (Perez v. Lippold, 32 Calif. (2d) 711, 725, 198 P. (2d) 17, 25 (1948).) In fields which "jim crow" laws do not cover there has been "a slow trend toward a breakdown of segregation"; within the fields of their operation the laws "keep the pattern rigid." (1 Myrdal, An American Dilemma, p. 635).

Professional opinion is almost unanimous that segregation has detrimental psychological effects on those segregated. A questionnaire addressed to 849 representative social scientists was answered by 61% of those to whom it was sent (Deutscher & Chein, The Psychological Effect of Enforced Segregation: A Survey of Social Science Opinion, 26 Journal of Psychology, 259, 261, 262 (1948)). Of those replying, 90.4% believed that enforced segregation has "detrimental psychological effects" on those segregated if "equal facilities" are provided; 2.3% expressed the opposite opinion, and 7.4% did not answer the question or expressed no opinion (Id., 261, 266). Those who elaborated their position with comments (55% of those replying) stressed that segregation induced feelings of inferiority, insecurity, frustration, and persecution, and that it developed, on the one hand, submissiveness, martyrdom, withdrawal tendencies, and fantasy, and on the other hand, aggression (Id., 272, 277).

The resentment and hostility provoked by segregation find various means of psychological "accommodation", various forms of release (Prudhomme, The Problem of Suicide in the American Negro, 25 Psychoanalytic Review, 187, 200). Mediocrity is accepted as a standard because of the absence of adequate social rewards or acceptance (Dollard, Caste and Color in a Southern Town, 424 (1937)). (McLean, Group Tension, 2 Journal of American Medical Women's Association, 479, 482). Energy and emotion which might be constructively used are lost in the process of adjustment to the "jim crow" concept of the Negro's characteristics and his inferior status in society (Cooper, The Frustrations of Being a Member of a Minority Group: What Does It Do To The Individual and to His Relationship with Other People?, 29 Mental Hygiene, 189, 190, 191 (1945)).[8] Psychosomatic disease is induced by the tensions engendered by segregation and other forms of racial discrimination. (McLean, Psychodynamic Factors in Racial Relations, 244 The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science (March, 1946), 159, 161).

It is further submitted that any suggestion that no punishment is inflicted ignores the basic realities of the situation. The whole theory upon which a segregated school system is maintained is that the dominant class regards the subject group so far inferior as to require quarantining the latter during school hours, to avoid contamination or pollution of the children of the dominant group. Realization of this motive, when it first comes to a child of the segregated class, cannot help but cause mental anguish (i.e., constitutes injury) and repeated reminders of the implications of segregation keep one's awareness of the badge of inferiority fresh during the remainder of one's life.

According to the Brief Amicus Curiae of the Committee of Law Teachers against Segregation in Legal Education before the Supreme Court of the United States in Sweatt v. Painter, supra, at p. 33, "The institution of segregation is designed to maintain the Negro race in a position of inferiority. It drastically retards his educational, economic and political development and prevents him from exercising his rightful powers as a citizen. It creates maladjustments and tensions which sap the vitality of our society."

In addition to the conclusions by experts in the field that segregation is punishment, this Court has characterized similar results of State and Federal statutes as punishment. The rights protected by due process of law include life, liberty and property. Any statute directed at a named individual or an easily recognizable class, which seeks to punish by deprivation or suspension of any of these rights without a judicial trial is a bill of attainder. Cummings v. Missouri, supra. This Court, in the Cummings case, said at pages 321-322: "The theory upon which our political institutions rest is, that all men have certain inalienable rights—that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and that in the pursuit of happiness all avocations, all honors, all positions, are alike open to everyone, and that in the protection of these rights all are equal before the law. Any deprivation or suspension of these rights for past conduct is punishment, and can be in no otherwise defined." The acquisition of knowledge is one of the protected rights. Meyer v. Nebraska, supra. The permanent prohibition against attendance in non-segregated schools is as much punishment as one which perpetually restrains one from serving the Government. United States v. Lovett, supra.

Any contention that no injury is inflicted should be considered not only from the point of view of the contentions advanced in Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629 (1950), and in Henderson v. United States, 339 U. S. 816 (1950), but in the light of Oyama v. California, supra, at page 646;

> "There remains the question of whether discrimination between citizens on the basis of their racial descent, as revealed in this case, is justifiable. Here we start with the proposition that only the most exceptional circumstances can excuse discrimination on that basis in the face of the equal protection clause and a federal statute giving all citizens the right to own land . . ."

Adult petitioners are certainly subject to punishment if they attempt to enforce the right of their children to sit in school with white children, either by withholding[9] their children from attendance at a segregated colored school, or by an attempt to place them at a segregated white school. Petitioners and all other persons who are under the interdiction of the statutes as interpreted by the Board[10] are [10] "Without any doubt there is also in the white man's concept of Negro 'race' an irrational element which cannot be grasped in terms of either biological or cultural differences. It is like the concept 'unclean' in primitive religion. It is invoked by the metaphor 'blood' when describing ancestry. The ordinary man means something particular but beyond secular and rational understanding when he refers to 'blood'. The one who has got the smallest drop of 'Negro blood' is as one who is smitten by a hideous disease. It does not help if he is good and honest, educated and intelligent, a good worker, an excellent citizen and an agreeable fellow. Inside him are hidden some unknown and dangerous potentialities, something which will sooner or later crop up." 1 Mydral, 100.

attainted by reason of their birth, blood and pigmentation, and there is no way in which they can overcome the obstacles placed in their way by respondents.

(2). This Punishment is Arbitrarily Imposed.

We submit that it may properly be held that punishment is arbitrarily imposed where an act forbidden bears no relation to the object allegedly sought to be achieved. And it is certainly true in this case that discriminating against minor petitioners because of their birth, color and blood and the previous servitude of their grandparents or great-grandparents bears no relation whatsoever to their educability in a public school together with white children.

This argument is supported by the following quotation in Petition and Brief in Support of Petition for Writ of Certiorari in the Supreme Court of the United States in Sweatt v. Painter, supra:

> "Dr. Robert Redfield, Chairman of the Department of Anthropology at the University of Chicago, testified, as an expert, that there is no recognizable difference as to capacities between students of different races and that scientific studies had concluded that differences in intellectual capacity or ability to learn have not been shown to exist between Negroes and other students. He testified that as a result of his training and study in his specialized field for some twenty years, it was his opinion that given a similar learning situation with a similar degree of preparation, one student would do as well as the other, on the average, without regard to race or color."

In regard to the question of a relationship between the act punished and the objective of the punishment, the Supreme Court had this to say at pages 319-320 in Cummings v. Missouri, supra:

> ". . . There can be no connection between the fact that Mr. Cummings entered or left the State of Missouri to avoid enrollment or draft in the military service of the United States and his fitness to teach the doctrines or administer the sacraments of his church, nor can a fact of this kind or the expression of words of smypathy with some of the persons drawn into the Rebellion constitute any evidence of the unfitness of the attorney or counsellor to practice his profession, or of the professor to teach the ordinary branches of education, or of the want of business knowledge or business capacity in the manager of a corporation, or in any director or trustee. It is manifest upon the simple statement of many of the acts and of the professions and pursuits, that there is no such relation between them as to render a denial of the commission of the acts at all appropriate as a condition of allowing the exercise of the professions and pursuits. The oath could not, therefore, have been required as a means of ascertaining whether parties were qualified or not for their respective callings or the trusts with which they were charged. It was required in order to reach the person, not the calling. It was exacted, not from any notion that the several acts designated indicated unfitness for the callings, but because it was thought that the several acts deserved punishment and that for many of them there was no way to inflict punishment except by depriving the parties, who had committed them, of some of the rights and privileges of the citizen.

"The disabilities created by the constitution of Missouri must be regarded as penalties—they constitute punishment. We do not agree with the counsel of Missouri that 'to punish one is to deprive him of life, liberty, or property, and that to take from him any thing less than these is no punishment at all.' The learned counsel does not use these terms—life, liberty, and property—as comprehending every right known to the law. He does not include under liberty freedom from outrage on the feelings as well as restraint on the person. He does not include under property those estates which one may acquire in professions, though they are often the source of the highest emoluments and honors. The deprivation of any rights, civil or political, previously enjoyed, may be punishment, the circumstances attending and the causes of the deprivation determining this fact. Disqualification from office > may be punishment as in cases of conviction upon impeachment. Disqualification from the pursuits of a lawful avocation, or from positions of trust, or from the privilege of appearing in the courts, or acting as an executor, administrator, or guardian, may also, and often has been, imposed as punishment." (Italics supplied.)

As we have already stated, in the present case there is absolutely no relation between color and educability. Therefore, when the respondents maintain separate schools for colored and white children, they seek to insult and degrade the former, not to educate. And, since it is thus a crime to be colored, Negro children are being arbitrarily punished by being singled out and deprived of their rights and privileges—i. e., to be given the same education under the same conditions as any other child, whatever his color. Further, respondents clearly do not include in their definition of liberty freedom from outrage on the feelings, since they inflict such arbitrary punishment on more than half the children under their jurisdiction every day they operate. There is no requirement that there must have been a previous enjoyment of a right. A study of the entire passage shows clearly that the Court means by any right previously enjoyed, any right constitutionally possessed.

We have already adverted to the fact that the lack of any relationship between the methods used and the end sought to be attained is sufficient to constitute arbitrary imposition of punishment. Mr. Justice Murphy, in a concurring opinion in Oyama v. California, supra, observed that no rational basis for legislation existed where laws discriminating against citizens were motivated by racial hatred and intolerance.

And in Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U. S. 535, 541 (1942), this Court used racial discrimination as a standard for striking down a State law providing for sterilization of certain offenders, in the following terms: "When the law lays an unequal hand on those who have committed intrinsically the same quality of offense and sterilizes one and not the other, it has made as invidious a discrimination as if it had selected a particular race or nationality for oppressive treatment."

Having shown that minor petitioners have, in fact, suffered injury and punishment by reason of their segregation, and that the segregation on account of race or color may properly be regarded as wholly arbitrarily imposed punishment, we proceed to examine the other elements of a bill of attainder.

No Trial or Hearing Is Given Petitioners.

In a bill of attainder punishment is inflicted without a judicial trial, Cummings v. Missouri, supra. In the case at bar, nothing can be clearer than that, if the Board of Education is right in its contention that these Congressional Acts bar any Negro child, at any time, from attending a public school designated for use of white children, solely on the basis of race or color, these minor petitioners have been found guilty of being Negroes and convicted of the offense of possessing some inherent defects which render them unfit to attend Sousa Junior High School without a judicial trial. There has never been a finding, either by the Board or by Congress, that all Negro children, or any particular individuals among them constituted any such menace to white pupils as would warrant isolating all Negroes in schools limited by law to their sole use. No reason for segregation has ever been announced. And there has certainly been no attempt to try these individual minor petitioners to determine whether there is any valid ground for depriving them of their right to associate free of a limitation based on their race or color alone in school activities with white children of their own age.

These Petitioners Are Convicted on Past Acts of a Crime by These Acts of Congress.

In Cummings v. State of Missouri, supra, page 323, this Court defined a bill of attainder as " . . . a legislative act which inflicts punishment without a judicial trial." The opinion then continued: "If the punishment be less than death, the act is termed a bill of pains and penalties. Within the meaning of the Constitution, bills of attainder include bills of pains and penalties." The remainder of the opinion is, we think, particularly appropriate in the present case: "In these cases the legislative body, in addition to its legitimate functions, exercises the powers and office of judge; it assumes, in the language of the text-books, judicial magistracy; it pronounces upon the guilt of the party, without any of the forms or safeguards of trial; it determines the sufficiency of the proofs produced, whether conformable to the rules of evidence or otherwise; and it fixes the degree of punishment in accordance with its own notions of the enormity of the offense."

Certainly the portion of the opinion just quoted fits the present situation. If the Board, in acting for the legislature is compelled by statute to segregate Negroes and whites, it is acting under legislation which has convicted Negroes of the crime of being inferior by birth, blood, and color and dooms them to separation, without declaring a previous condition of birth, blood or color to be a crime; the guilt attaches to any child the Board sees fit to classify as a Negro (Wall v. Oyster, supra), without any trial; without any proof that an individual Negro child is in fact so far inferior by birth, blood and color to white children that he may not associate with them in school, it requires that the Negro be taught in a separate schoolhouse; and it fixes the sentence to cover the entire time the child is subject to the jurisdiction of the Board and affects his entire life and deprives him of liberty, property, job opportunity and happiness.

It is manifestly clear that this Court should not interpret these Acts of Congress as compelling racial segregation which would render them unconstitutional when it is possible to interpret them as not requiring segregation and thus render them constitutional. We must assume that Congress enacted these statutes with a constitutional intent. See, Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U. S. 118, 157, 158 (1943). This would necessarily mean that they do not compel segregation for if these statutes are interpreted as compelling segregation they would clearly fall within the ban of the constitutional provision against bills of attainder.

D.

The Denial of Admission of Minor Petitioners to Sousa Junior High School Solely on the Basis of Race or Color Deprives Them of Their Civil Rights in Violation of Title 8, United States Code, Sections 41 and 43.

It is apparent to petitioners that the racially segregated schools of the District of Columbia administered under control of respondents are operated in violation of the Civil Rights Act, Sections 41 and 43 of Title 8, U. S. Code, which provide:

Section 41. Equal rights under the law:

> All persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every State and Territory, to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, give evidence, and to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, penalties, taxes, licenses, and exactions of every kind, and to no other. R. S. Section 1977.

Section 43. Civil action for deprivation of rights:

> Every person who, under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage, of any State or Territory, subjects, or causes to be subjected, any citizen of the United States or other person within the > jurisdiction thereof to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws, shall be liable to the party injured in an action at law, suit in equity, or other proper proceeding for redress. R. S. Section 1979.

In Hurd v. Hodge, 334 U.S. 24, 31, this Court, in prohibiting courts of the District of Columbia from enforcement of racial restrictive covenants said of Section 42 of Title 8 U. S. Code, a companion section of Section 41 which is relied upon here:

> All the petitioners in these cases, as found by the District Court, are citizens of the United States. We have no doubt that for the purposes of this section, the District of Columbia is included within the phrase 'every State and Territory.' Nor can there be doubt of the constitutional power of Congress to enact such legislation with reference to the District of Columbia."

While it is true that petitioners do not rely upon Title 8, U. S. Code, Section 42, the section of the Civil Rights Act considered in Hurd v. Hodge, supra, but upon Sections 41 and 43, it is hardly possible to conceive that the Supreme Court would make any differentiation in the applicability of these sections to the District of Columbia. The genesis of Sections 41 and 42 are the same. Both sections were originally contained in Section 1, Chapter 31 of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 (14 Stat. 27). Although now placed in different sections of Title 8, U. S. Code, both Sections—41 and 42—secure the rights of persons and citizens in "every State and Territory". Hence, just as under the interpretation of Section 42 in Hurd v. Hodge, supra, the term "every State and Territory" must be said to include the District of Columbia, as regard Section 41. Any other construction would lack uniformity and would be unreasonable and historically illogical.

Section 43 of Title 8, U. S. Code, is derived from the Act of April 20, 1871, Chapter 22, 17 Stat. 13. As presently entitled under the Code, this section provides for a "civil action for deprivation of rights". Obviously, therefore, if Section 41 of the Civil Rights Act is applicable to the District of Columbia, the section of the Civil Rights Act recognizing the means by which civil rights are vindicated by actions at law or suits in equity is equally applicable to violations of civil rights occurring in the District of Columbia. We conclude, therefore, that both Sections 41 and 43 are within the constitutional power of Congress to enact, and that these sections are operative in the District of Columbia.

The remaining question is whether government enforced racial segregation in the public schools of the District of Columbia is violative of the Civil Rights Act. Petitioners contend that racial segregation in the public schools as enforced by respondent under color of law does violate these sections.

The Congress of the United States, acting pursuant to its powers in the District of Columbia, has provided for public education there. It has given to persons residing within the District the privilege of securing, at public expense, an elementary and high school education. This privilege, we contend, once given must be afforded to all without any racial distinction. The Civil Rights Act compels such a result.

The Civil Rights Act does not specifically mention public education. In fact, there is no specification of the particular rights protected, but rather a broad statement concerning "full and equal benefits of all laws" and enjoyment of "rights, privileges or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws". However, when we view the sections presumably directed against discriminatory governmental action in the light of the provisions of the Act of March 1, 1875, Chapter 114, 18 Stat. 335, concerning racial discrimination by individuals within the United States, it becomes abundantly clear that the sections here under discussion were meant to cover all situations in which, through governmental action, persons are deprived of some right, privilege or immunity recognized under the Constitution and laws of the United States. And these sections were enacted to insure that all citizens, white and black, should be vested with the same rights and the same responsibilities as citizens. Racial distinctions were thereby prohibited.

The cases support this analysis. In United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, 555 (1875), this Court observed:

> "No question arises under the Civil Rights Act of April 9, 1866 (14 Stat. 27), which is intended for the protection of citizens of the United States in the enjoyment of certain rights, without discrimination on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, . . ."

And, in Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313, 318 (1879), the Supreme Court stated that:

> "The plain object of these [civil rights] statutes, as of the Constitution which authorized them, was to place the colored race, in respect of civil rights, upon a level with whites. They made the rights and responsibilities, civil and criminal, of the two races exactly the same."

Our national policy, as found in the Constitution, laws and treaties of the United States as well as in the applicable legal precedents, renders unlawful the actions of respondents in excluding minor petitioners from attendance at Sousa Junior High School solely because of race and color. In speaking of the Fourteenth Amendment and the Civil Rights Act of 1866, of which Sections 41 and 43 are constituent parts, this Court in Hurd v. Hodge, supra, at page 32, said:

> ". . . It is clear that in many significant respects the statute and the Amendment were expressions of > the same general congressional policy. Indeed, as the legislative debates reveal, one of the primary purposes of many members of Congress in supporting the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment was to incorporate the guarantees of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 in the organic law of the land . . ."

In a series of State cases this Court has made clear some prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment against government enforced distinctions based solely on race or color. In the case of Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303, 306, 307 (1879), this Court condemned the systematic exclusion of colored persons from juries. Similarly the right to qualify as a voter in primary or general elections has been protected against denial because of race or color. Smith v. Allwright, 321 U. S. 649 (1944). This Court has held that the Constitution of the United States prohibits denial to a person, because of his race or ancestry, of the right to pursue his accustomed calling. Takahashi v. Fish and Game Commission, 334 U. S. 410 (1948); Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356 (1886). States may not enforce agreements excluding Negroes from owning or occupying property in white neighborhoods. Shelly v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1 (1948). Nor may railroads segregate Negro passengers in dining cars. Henderson v. United States, 339 U. S. 816 (1950). Nor may state universities, when they admit Negroes, make any racial distinctions in affording them educational opportunities. McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637 (1950).

These holdings are clearly indicative of the construction to be given to the relevant provisions of the Civil Rights Act in their application to the school officials of the District of Columbia. Moreover, the explicit language employed by Congress to effectuate its purposes leaves no doubt that exclusion of minor petitioners from Sousa Junior High School solely because of race or color is prohibited by the Civil Rights Act. That statute by its terms, requires that all persons shall have the same rights "as is enjoyed by white citizens . . . to the full and equal benefit of all laws." That minor petitioners have been denied that right by virtue of the action of the respondents is clear. They have been denied admission to Sousa Junior High School solely by reason of race or color. It is no answer to petitioners to say that whites may also be denied admission to some Negro school because of race or color.

BLEED THROUGH

Speaking on this exact point in Shelley v. Kraemer, supra, at page 22, this Court, speaking through Chief Justice Vinson, said:

> " . . . Equal protection of the laws is not achieved through indiscriminate imposition of inequalities."

That these sections of the Civil Rights Act prohibit racial distinctions is too clear for argument. That these sections encompass the right or privilege of public education is free from any reasonable doubt, for at the very foundation of our democratic institutions, in the preservation of rights and the recognition of the duties of citizens, stands the public school as the logical agency for giving the people the attitudes and skills requisite for effective participation in a democracy. We strongly urge this Court to recognize that the Civil Rights Act prohibits government enforced racial segregation in public education in the District of Columbia.

E.

The Court Below Erred in Not Granting Petitioners the Relief Prayed for and in Granting Respondents' Motion to Dismiss Minor Petitioners' Complaint on the Ground That It Failed to State a Claim on Which Relief Could Be Granted.

Reference to the pleadings in the instant case reveals that the respondents relied upon a motion to dismiss on the sole ground "that the complaint fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted".

Such a motion to dismiss, as was true of the old common law demurrer, now abolished in the District of Columbia, said in so many words that the allegations of the complaint with all legal inference conceded did not spell out a cause of action. All things alleged for the purposes of the pleadings must be accepted as being true. What then are the essential allegations of the complaint? Clearly and unequivocally the complaint alleges that the respondents with full power of allocation of minor petitioners in the public schools of the District of Columbia, failed to assign the minor petitioners to the Sousa Junior High School and actually refused them admission to said Sousa Junior High School solely because of their race or color. The motion to dismiss concedes the accuracy of this statement. The complaint alleges further that the respondents are construing and applying Acts of Congress so as to require them to deny minor petitioners admission to and to exclude them from the Sousa Junior High School for no other reason than because of their race or color. This allegation the motion to dismiss freely admits. The complaint alleges that every administrative requirement was met in seeking admission of minor petitioners to the Sousa Junior High School. The motion to dismiss agrees that this was done. The complaint alleges that the respondents are pursuing and have pursued the policy, practice, custom and usage of denying minor petitioners admission to and excluding them from attendance as pupils at the Sousa Junior High School and from enjoyment of the educational opportunities afforded therein solely because of their race or color. The motion to dismiss concedes such action on the part of the respondents. The complaint seeks not only injunctive relief to correct these violations of the petitioners' constitutional and statutory rights, but, asks the court to render a declaratory judgment to the effect that statutes enacted by Congress regulating public education in the District of Columbia do not require exclusion of the minor petitioners from the Sousa Junior High School, and that respondents are required by the Constitution and laws of the United States to admit said minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School and to refrain from any distinctions with respect to them because of their race or color.

BLEED THROUGH

Facing the test to which the complaint was put by the motion to dismiss, the Court below, through Judge Walter M. Bastian, embraced the theory urged by respondents and signed an order dismissing the cause.

"ORDER

"Upon consideration of the complaint, of the motion of the defendants to dismiss the above-entitled cause, of the memoranda of points and authorities in support of and in opposition to said motion and of the arguments of counsel for the plaintiffs and for the defendants, it is, by the Court, this 9th day of April, 1951,

"ORDERED, that the above-entitled cause be, and it is hereby, finally dismissed.

"(s) Walter M. Bastian, Judge."

This order is tantamount to a judicial pronouncement that an admitted statement of denial of civil rights by government officials, solely on the ground of race or color, presents no cause for relief. This order amounts to a direct statement that the defendants below correctly interpreted and put into effect statutes enacted by Congress as compelling racial segregation in the public schools of the District of Columbia, and that said respondents lawfully pursued the policy, practice, custom and usage of denying minor petitioners admission to Sousa Junior High School solely because of their race or color; and that such interpretation, enforcement, and action on the part of said respondents did no violence to the constitutional and statutory rights of the petitioners. The very making of such statements carries its own refutation.

The Court below clearly erred in not requiring the respondents to answer the complaint. The Court also erred in not issuing a declaratory judgment to the effect that no congressional statute in the District of Columbia could be properly interpreted as requiring racial segregation, and to the effect further that said respondents are required by the Constitution and laws of the United States to admit said minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School and to refrain from any distinction with respect to them solely because of their race or color. The Court erred in not restraining the action of the respondents in refusing to admit minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color, without authority, and in violation of the constitutional and statutory rights of the petitioners.

F.

This Court Should Declare That the Actions of Respondents in Requiring Segregation in the Public Schools Is Unlawful. It Should Direct the District Court to Enter a Decree Ordering That Such Segregation Be Discontinued Forthwith and That Petitioners Be Admitted to Sousa Junior High School Without Distinction As to Race or Color, As Soon As Necessary Administrative Adjustments Can Be Made and in No Event Later Than the Beginning of the Next School Year.

This portion of the brief is directed to questions four and five of the Order of this Court dated June 8, 1953:

> "4. Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment,
>
> (a) would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, or
> (b) may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?
> "5. On the assumption on which questions 4(a) and (b) are based, and assuming further that this Court will exercise its equity powers to the end described in question 4(b),

(a) should this Court formulate detailed decrees in these cases;

(b) if so what specific issues should the decrees reach;

(c) should this Court appoint a special master to hear evidence with a view to recommending specific terms for such decrees;

(d) should this Court remand to the courts of first instance with directions to frame decrees in these cases, and if so, what general directions should the decrees of this Court include and what procedures should the courts of first instance follow in arriving at the specific terms of more detailed decrees?"

Petitioners should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice.

The way in which this question is framed would suggest that this question is not applicable to the District of Columbia case, however, in order that this Court may have the benefit of our views, we are assuming that the question is based upon a finding that segregation violates the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution.

"It is fundamental that these cases concern rights which are personal and present". Sweatt v. Painter, 1950, 339 U. S. 629, 635; see also Sipuel v. Board of Regents, 332 U. S. 631, 633; Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337, 352. The rights of the parents and their children, with respect to education are fundamental rights guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment against arbitrary action by the Federal Government. Farrington v. Tokushige, 273 U. S. 284 and see Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U. S. 510; Myer v. Nebraska, 262 U. S. 390. They are personal because each petitioner is asserting his individual constitutional right to grow up in our democratic society without the impress of government imposed racial segregation in the public schools. They are present because they will be irretrievably lost if their enjoyment is put off. The rights of the adult students in Sweatt, Sipuel, Gaines and McLaurin cases required, this Court held, vindication forthwith. A fortiori this is true of the rights of children who are growing through their vital formative years. As to them, "postponement" is a mere euphemism for denial of justice. It follows that petitioners are entitled to be admitted forthwith to Sousa Junior High School without distinction as to race and color. Since the number of named petitioners in this case is small no administrative difficulties can arise as to them.

There is no warrant in equity for postponement of petitioner's enjoyment of their rights.

Petitioners' rights are by nature unsuited to postponement by equity.

Petitioners have no desire to set precise bounds to the reserve discretion of equity. They concede that, as a court of chancery, this Court has power to mold its relief to individual circumstances in ways and to an extent which it would be undesirable to define with entire precision. But the rights established by these petitioners are far outside the class as to which, whether for denial or delay, a nice "balance of convenience" has been or ought to be struck.

The minor petitioners are asserting the most important secular claims that can be put forward by children, the claim to their full measure of the chance to learn and grow, and the inseparably connected but even more important claim to be treated as entire citizens of the society into which they have been born.

We have discovered no case in which such rights, once established, have been postponed to a cautious calculation of conveniences. The nuisance cases, the sewage cases, the cases of the overhanging cornices, need not be distinguished. They distinguish themselves.

BLEED THROUGH

If equity remembers itself, it will indeed mold its remedy to fit petitioners claims—but the molding will be to an artful swiftness.

Affirming the decree of one of the few judges still carrying the traditional title and power of Chancellor, the highest court of Delaware epitomized equity in one of the cases now before this bar when it declared (Gebhart v. Belton, 91 A. 2d 137, 149):

> " . . . To require the plaintiffs to wait another year under present conditions would be in effect partially to deny them that to which we have held they are entitled."

b.

Even should this Court proceed to consider the propriety of a decree postponing desegregation, assay of the factors involved makes it clear that in the District of Columbia there is no necessity for a "gradual decree".

Before examining alleged bases for delaying relief to petitioners, three preliminary remarks are necessary.

First, we have, in the main, to guess at the factors respondents might bring forward to support a plea for postponement rather than total denial for they have taken ground from which they can only plead that this shabby business of government compelled racism must be allowed to go on so long as the federal government wills it.

Secondly, in deciding whether sufficient reasons exist for postponing the enjoyment of petitioners' rights, this Court is not resolving an issue upon a mere preponderance of the evidence. It needs no citation of authority to establish that the defendant in equity who asks the chancellor to go slow in upholding the most vital rights of children accruing to them under the Constitution must make out an affirmative case of crushing conviction to sustain his plea for delay. Respondents have not done this on this record, and it is hard to see how they can do it in supplementary proceedings or in matters outside the record, for their matter must sound in disputed prophecy, if not in menace, and human prophecy is as shaky a ground for the denial of known present justice as menace is unsuitable to the attention of chancery.

Thirdly, the problem of gradualism cannot fairly arise at all in this case. Here the appeal is from a dismissal of the complaint on motion, and there is in the record no matter whatever suggesting difficulty in accomplishing desegregation. Surely it would be a curious as well as a gratuitous assumption that such a change cannot be expeditiously handled in this nation's capital.

In fact desegregation has proceeded so rapidly in the District of Columbia in the last decade that there is practically no area save in the public schools where segregation is still practiced. Negroes and whites work together, play together and live in the same neighborhoods with no friction. Segregation in street cars and busses has been outlawed in the District of Columbia since 1865, Act of March 3, 1865 (13 Stat. 536, 537). We respectfully request this Court to take judicial notice that;— Negroes are now admitted into many professional groups and voluntary associations formerly for white only, e.g., The District of Columbia Medical Society, American Institute of Architects, American Association of University Women. The largest employer in the District of Columbia, the United States Government, expressly prohibits segregation in its employment policies. The National Capitol Housing Authority has announced that its new housing projects will be and some of its old housing projects have been desegregated. Negroes are presently freely admitted to all Catholic schools and most of the other parochial and private schools in the District of Columbia. White and Negro children attend together a large number of private kindergartens and nursery schools and increasingly play together on the playgrounds under the desegregated policy of the Recreation Board of the District of Columbia. Negro and white teachers meet together in an integrated teachers' union. Both races attend without segregation all the legitimate theatres, concert and lecture halls as well as most motion picture theatres. Many white and Negroes attend the same churches. Moreover, segregation in restaurants and cafes has been outlawed since 1873 and since that pronouncement of this Court in District of Columbia v. John R. Thompson, 73 S. C. 1007, Negroes eat, without racial incidents, in all restaurants in the District of Columbia. In the southwest section, white and Negro parents and teachers meet together to plan for neighborhood improvement.

Therefore the factual situation in the District of Columbia makes a gradual decree unnecessary.

We concede that there may well be difficulties and delays of a purely administrative nature involved in bringing about desegregation. Any injunction requires time for compliance and we do not ask the impossible. We strongly urge, however, that no reason has been suggested and none has been discovered by us that would warrant denying petitioners their full rights beyond the beginning of the next school year.

But we do not understand that the "gradual adjustment" mentioned in this Court's fourth and fifth questions referred to such possible necessities.

Finally, it would be strange indeed to find any possible considerations serving to slow the hand of equity. A good part of the early work of the Chancellor's court had to do precisely with the protection of the weak and helpless from powerful local antagonisms (See, e.g., Inhabitants of Whitby v. New York (1553) in 12 Sheldon Society, Select Cases in the Court of Requests (1889) op. 192-200 and see Introduction, p. XX; see also Maitland, Equity, 4-6 (1936))

Finally, we cannot forget that petitioners, too, place public interests in the balance. Petitioners assert that there is a public interest also in the reaffirmation of a constitutional right fought for and won almost a century ago, namely, the enjoyment by all of a common citizenship unrestricted by governmentally imposed distinctions based solely on race or color one of the severest embarrassments to our country in its international relations.

This Court should not formulate detailed decrees.

Petitioners urge that this Court make no attempt to formulated detailed decree in this case but rather that it send down its mandate directing that minor petitioners be admitted to Sousa Junior High School and that the Respondents be enjoined from imposing distinctions based on race or color alone in the administration of the public schools of the District of Columbia.

The formulation of a detailed decree would involve this Court and the Court below in elaborate administrative questions having to do with public schools.

Above all, the school boards, the courts, and the people, in the District of Columbia are law-abiding officials and citizens. They have acted in good faith under their view of the law. We believe that this Court may confidently anticipate that an authoritative holding, and an injunction in general terms, will be all that is needful to bring about compliance with the Constitution and that respondents will address themselves sincerely to the task of complying with the law.

Petitioners are unable, in good faith, to suggest terms for a decree for an effective gradual adjustment, for they sincerely believe that no such decree will be efficacious in protecting petitioners' rights while at the same time minimizing purported difficulties attendant on desegration.

While desiring to answer responsively the Fifth question posed by the Court in setting this case down for reargument, petitioners have been unable to visualize any bona fide criteria for determining a method of delay that would protect the constitutional rights of the named petitioners and the class they represent to admission to public schools on a non-segregated basis.

BLEED THROUGH

As already noted, petitioners concede the possibility of delay until the next school year by reason of administrative requirements. Beyond this, petitioners respectfully submit that their duty to this Court may better be discharged by commenting upon any plans for postponement that may be put forward by respondents, than by the pro forma proposal of decree terms which they believe unwise and unwarranted.

This Court should not appoint a master.

It follows that there is no need for this Court to appoint a master. Since repeal in 1948 of the 1805 Statute forbidding the introduction of new evidence at an appellate level, there would appear to be no reason why such master could not be appointed (280 U. S. C. § 863 (1946)). Certainly respected authorities have recommended the practice of appellate courts' taking evidence (see 1 Wigmore, Evidence § 41 (3d ed., 1940); Pound, "Appellate Procedure in Civil Cases" (1941) pp. 303, 387; Note, 56 Harv. L. Rev. 1313 (1943)) and in other times and jurisdictions it has been respected practice. (See Smith, Appeals of the Privy Council from American Plantations 310 (1950); Rules of the Supreme Court of Judicature, order 58, Rules 1, 2; cf. New Mexico, St. 1949, Mar. 17, c. 168, § 19.) However, taking of evidence by master is undoubtedly a departure from normal practice on appeal and it may result in loss of time to the prejudice of petitioner's rights.

The terms of the decree we believe should be stated by the District Court.

This Court should remand this case to the District Court with instructions to that Court to enter an order granting an injunction restraining respondents from denying minor petitioners admission to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color and ordering respondents to cease discriminating on the basis of race or color in administering the public schools in the District of Columbia.

CONCLUSION.

The question whether the Federal Government has the power to compel the segregation of pupils on the basis of race or color alone in affording educational opportunities in the public schools in the District of Columbia is here presented to this Court for the first time. Here no question of equality of facilities is in issue. Here is raised the sole question whether under our democratic system and the protective covering of our Constitution, Congress or public school officials, either or both, have the power to bar Negroes from studying with whites in public schools in the District of Columbia because of their race or color alone. No reason or justification is offered by the respondent nor, in the opinion of the petitioners, can any be given, save the dubious one that the Acts of Congress compel it.

Our international relations, our concepts of liberty, our belief in democracy, cannot be reconciled with government imposed racial segregation in education in the District of Columbia. The history of our country, the loyalty of the Negro, the decisions of this Court, all require a condemnation of this un-American practice.

Government action has passed beyond the brink of constitutionality when it imposes disabilities upon the Negro people, loyal in war and in peace, native born citizens, limiting their liberty of choice of schools solely because of their race or color. This Court has approved of comparable federal action only when the fate of the Nation was at stake, and even then, it subjected the Government's action to a searching inquiry and laid down definite standards which the Government was required to meet. The actions of respondents in the instant case not only were not taken under such perilous circumstances, but did not meet even the minimum standards set for imposing racial distinctions under those conditions.

Wherefore it is respectfully submitted that the decree of the District Court should be reversed.

REPLY BRIEF FOR PETITIONERS ON REARGUMENT

In Part I of this brief we repeat the reply brief filed in this case on argument for the convenience of the Court; and, in Part II of this brief we reply to the brief of Respondents on Reargument.

PART I.

In order to clarify the issues in this case and to indicate some minor corrections in the briefs and record and to disclose some apparent misconceptions on the part of respondents with respect to the legal theory underlying petitioners' cause of action, petitioners submit this reply brief.

This reply brief deals with certain of the points advanced by the respondents in their brief which will be identified by number and language as used by respondents.

I.

The Complaint Filed Below States No Cause of Action Because, Inter Alia, It Fails To Set Forth Any Injuries To The Petitioners.

Here respondents rely upon the fact that minor petitioners do now attend a junior high school in said District of Columbia to support their assertion that the complaint fails to set forth any injury to the petitioners because (1) the compulsory law does not require petitioners to send their children to public schools and does not require them to go to any school; (2) the complaint fails to show by comparison that Sousa Junior High School has educational opportunities which are superior to educational opportunities in the high school which minor petitioners do now attend, and (3) the allegations of the petitioners are merely legal conclusions.

It is evident that respondents misconceive the gravamen of the complaint. For the purpose of determining whether the injury has been alleged it is only necessary to examine the allegations of the complaint with respect to factual matters in the light of the motion to dismiss. The motion to dismiss, like the old common law demurrer, admits all facts well pleaded. These facts are: that minor petitioners, Negroes, citizens and residents of the District of Columbia, accompanied by their parents, Negroes, citizens, taxpayers and residents of the District of Columbia, at the proper time for admission of students and possessing all qualifications for admission to a junior high school, applied to Sousa Junior High School for admission and enrollment and were denied admission and enrollment solely because of race or color. Admission to Sousa Junior High School was denied by respondent Eleanor P. McAuliffe, principal of Sousa Junior High School, solely upon the basis of race or color; and thereafter petitioners exhausted all of their administrative remedies up to and including the Board of Education, which Board still denied admission and enrollment into Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color. The petitioners are suffering irreparable injury by reason of this action of respondents and are threatened with irreparable injury in the future at the hands of respondents.

These facts clearly show an admission by the respondents that they denied petitioners admission to Sousa Junior High School for no reason other than because of their race or color, and that this denial was injurious and threatened to injure the petitioners in the future. These are all the facts essential to establish a justiciable claim by the petitioners and to provide a basis for the relief requested of the Court by the petitioners. Not only did respondents admit all these facts in their motion to dismiss, but with respect to all these facts except injury, they enumerate them in their brief as a correct statement of the facts. On these admitted facts the only question before this Court is a question of law.

That question of law is—Whether the respondents possess the power to segregate pupils in the District of Columbia for the purpose of public education solely on the basis of race or color. Or to express it in another way, whether the action of respondents in denying minor petitioners admission to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color violates rights secured to petitioners by the Constitution and laws of the United States. The court below dismissed the complaint, thus deciding this issue in the negative.

In the transmission of the record in this case, from the District Court to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, and in turn to this Court, a clause in paragraph sixteen of petitioners' original complaint was inadvertently omitted. This clause, italicized in the paragraph set out below, we submit for inclusion in the proceedings in this case.

"16. A present actual case or controversy exists between plaintiffs and defendants. Plaintiffs, and other Negroes similarly situated, on whose behalf this suit is brought, are suffering ireparable injury, and are threatened with irreparable injury in the future by reason of the acts of defendants hereinbefore set forth. They have no plain, adequate or complete remedy to redress the wrongs or illegal acts hereinbefore set forth other than this action for an injunction. Any other remedy to which plaintiffs, and other Negroes similarly situated, could be remitted would be attended by such uncertainties and delays as to deny substantial relief, would involve a multiplicity of suits, and would cause further irreparable injury, damage, vexation and inconvenience to plaintiffs and other Negroes similarly situated."

This clause as above set out was a part of the original complaint with respect to which the court below granted the motion to dismiss, and its inclusion here can in no wise prejudice the case of the respondents.

On the legal issue as to the power of respondents to take the action complained of, the mere deprivation of a civil right by government, has been held by this Court in numerous cases, to constitute injury. See: Giles v. Harris, 189 U. S. 475 (1903). In addition, the respondents admitted the well pleaded operative factual allegation of injury contained in paragraph 16 which allegation was not a legal conclusion.

As to the assertion that these petitioners were not compelled by law to send their children to any school or to the public schools, it is sufficient to point out that having chosen to avail themselves of the educational opportunities afforded by the government in the public schools, as they had a right to do, Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U. S. 390 (1923), petitioners were compelled by threat of criminal sanction to send their children to the school set apart by the respondents for Negroes alone.

As to respondents' contention that the failure of the petitioners to compare educational opportunities offered in the school they now attend with those afforded in Sousa Junior High School, it is apparent that respondents misconceive the legal theory underlying the complaint. Petitioners complain of a deprivation of the right to choose Sousa Junior High School without any limitation based solely on race or color, irrespective of the nature and availability of educational facilities elsewhere. Quite apart from that, petitioners' concession of equality of facilities is not a concession of equality of educational opportunities, for it is implicit in petitioners' complaint that the mere denial of admission on the basis of race or color is a denial per se of educational opportunities. The offering of education to minor petitioners in a segregated school is per se a limitation on the enjoyment of educational opportunities.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Thus, this case as presented to this Court on the complaint and the motion to dismiss, presents a record in which the factual basis is present for the relief sought and the only question remaining is whether the action of respondents herein complained of violates the Constitution and laws of the United States.

II.

A. Acts of Congress Providing For Education of Children of The District of Columbia Require Such Education In a Dual School System And Have Been So Construed by This Court.

B. Construction of Locally Applicable Laws By The Highest Court of The District of Columbia Is Normally Accepted By This Court.

Under this heading the respondents attempt to demonstrate that the congressional enactment of statutes relating to public education in the District of Columbia and the judicial interpretation thereof by the lower courts have accomplished a construction of these statutes which is binding upon this Court. It is the petitioners' position that the statutes in question do not authorize racial segregation nor do the re-enactments after an intervening judicial construction by a lower Federal court that the statutes do require racial segregation, bind this Court to accept this construction. At most, the re-enactment of congressional legislation and the judicial construction of that legislation by lower Federal courts are but aids to this Court in making its independent determination as to the proper construction to be given to the statutes. In Federal Communications System v. Columbia Broadcasting System, 311 U.S. 132, Mr. Justice Frankfurter states at page 138:

> "We are not, however, willing to rest decision on any doctrine concerning the implied enactment of judicial construction upon re-enactment of the statute. The persuasion that lies behind that doctrine is merely one factor in the total effort to give fair meaning to language."

It is certainly not arguable that the decision of Carr v. Corning, 86 App. D. C. 173, 182 F. (2d) 14 (1950), creates a well settled interpretation that these statutes compel segregation and are constitutional. As this Court said in United States v. Raynor, 302 U.S. 540 at 551:

> "The fact that Congress revised and codified the criminal laws after the Court of Appeals in the case of Krakowski, 161 Fed. 88, held that the act only prohibited possession of the distinctive paper, does not detract from the soundness of this conclusion. One decision construing an act does not approach the dignity of a well settled interpretation."

Where constitutional rights of individuals are concerned this Court has assumed the duty "in construing congressional enactments to take care to interpret them so as to avoid a danger of unconstitutionality" (United States v. C.I.O., 335 U.S. 106, 120-121) and certainly it is the position of the petitioners that to adopt the construction given these statutes by the Court of Appeals in Carr v. Corning, supra, would create a danger of unconstitutionality. The position of the respondents, with respect to the construction of these acts, therefore, is untenable. We agree with the language of this Court in this connection in Helvering v. Reynolds, 313 U.S. 428, at 431:

> "Respondents' position is not tenable . . . that rule is no more than an aid in statutory construction. While it is useful at times in resolving statutory ambiguities it does not mean that the prior construction has become so imbedded in the law that only Congress can effect a change."

III.

The Dual School System In The District of Columbia Is Not Violative of The Fifth Amendment To The Constitution of The United States.

In this section the respondents, in an apparent misconception of the law applicable to the complaint of the petitioners, first argue that Congress has more power to legislate for the District of Columbia than the State Legislatures have for the States. Then they argue that whatever limitations exist upon the States in the Fourteenth Amendment, no greater limitations exist with respect to the Federal Government in regard to racial disabilities imposed upon Negroes. They argue, for example, that under the Fifth Amendment slavery was constitutional, and that since the Fourteenth Amendment has not prohibited the establishment of the "separate but equal" doctrine in the education cases in the States, that it is certainly not prohibited by the Fifth Amendment. This is a misconception of the fundamental nature of the Federal Government.

Equality, equal justice under law, liberty, freedom of speech and association, and freedom of religion are fundamental and basic principles underlying the foundation of our government. Our government is one of laws and not of men. In this system, race is irrelevant. The system of slavery, constitutionally recognized both in the Constitution and in Dred Scott v. Sanford (citation), 19 Howard 393, was abolished by the Thirteenth Amendment. Citizenship was conferred upon Negroes under Clause 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment and thus both the system of slavery and the lack of citizenship status of the Negro set forth in the Dred Scott decision were removed as sources of constitutional power for the imposition of racial distinctions by the Federal Government upon Negroes. Thus our Government was brought into harmony and accord with its fundamental and basic principles—equality for all citizens—and a constitution that is color-blind.

The Federal Government is one of express powers and implied power necessary to carry out the express powers. It is too clear for argument that, since the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments, the Federal Government has no express power to make racial distinctions in affording educational opportunities to citizens in the District of Columbia. It is the petitioners' position that there is likewise no implied power to do so.

This Court has recognized such power in the Federal Government in only one series of cases—the Japanese War Cases—in which it was dealing with the all-embracing war power. There this Court found an implied power, necessary to deal with sabotage and espionage under threat of invasion in the midst of a world-wide conflict, to deal on the basis of ancestry with loyal citizens who were comingled with disloyal persons. Even there this Court laid down drastic limitations governing the exercise of this implied power. It is apparent that integrated education in the District of Columbia presents no such threat to our National security. And no implied power to deny minor petitioners admission to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color can be implied from the express power given Congress over the District of Columbia.

As an apparent justification for compulsory racial segregation in public education, respondents dwell at length upon quotations from Negroes who were urging the passage of a statute in 1906 designed to increase the power of the Negro superintendent of schools. The constitutional rights of petitioners are neither added to nor diminished by the irrelevant opinions of isolated individuals, Negro or white. This Court has said that the rights which petitioners assert here are individual rights. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U.S. 337. It is of no importance in this case as to whether the "separate but equal" doctrine is constitutionally permissible under the Fourteenth Amendment, although we take the position that it is not; for even if we concede, which we do not, that equal protection of law may be constitutionally satisfied under a racial classification, by testing the quantum of treatment afforded Negroes under the substantially equal theory—it is juristically inconceivable that we can test liberty under the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment by the quantum of liberty which is enjoyed. A deprivation of individual liberty under the due process clause must be tested by the reasonableness of the action of the government. The test is whether the action is arbitrary but never as to how much liberty is taken. Thus the opinions of individual persons as to whether segregation is good or bad is irrelevant and the test of the deprivation of liberty under the Fifth Amendment cannot be measured by the quantum test apparently used under the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment in civil rights cases.

Moreover, the decision as to the constitutionality of the respondents' action in denying minor petitioners admission to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color is strictly a legal question to be determined by this Court and legislative policy or action is not determinative.

PART II.

PETITIONERS TREAT RESPONDENTS ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS 4(a) AND 5 AS ONE ARGUMENT IN THIS REPLY.

I.

In their Brief on Reargument counsel for respondents undertake to justify what they refer to as a "strictly legal position" in support of respondents actions in excluding minor petitioners from Sousa Junior High School solely because of race or color. Counsel for petitioners recognize that this undertaking is both difficult and delicate by reason of the absolutely contrary position of other high government officials, but it is respectfully submitted that the Brief for Respondents on Reargument not only fails to meet the issues as raised by petitioners, but confuses the issues involved in the instant case with those involved in the "state cases", and makes assumptions that are not supported by available facts. It is a fact, as set forth by respondents on page 18 of their brief, that the policy of the President of the United States is to use all applicable authority of his high office to terminate all forms of segregation in the Nation's Capital. It is likewise a fact that the highest legal officer of the United States, the Attorney General, has filed a brief in this case in which he agrees with petitioners' views that respondents do not have the power or authority to deny minor petitioners admission to Sousa Junior High School solely on the basis of race or color. It is also a fact that the District Commissioners have ordered an end to all discrimination and segregation in the District Government. Thus, not only do the superior officers of the Government differ with counsel for respondents as to this "strictly legal position" but counsel on page 18 of their brief say that even some of the respondents themselves differ with them. Yet counsel for respondents say they are taking a "strictly legal position" which they believe is sound. This anomalous position of counsel for respondents is reflected in the various inconsistent positions taken in their brief.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

On page 13 of their brief counsel for respondents say they do not suggest that a gradual adjustment would be desirable or, indeed, necessary—but on page 15 of their brief they argue that time should be given "to properly indoctrinate teachers and the public to a radical change in the local educational policy." This is in fact a gradualist argument. Thus, it is difficult if not impossible, for petitioners to know what the "strictly legal position" of counsel for respondents really is.

Again throughout the brief counsel for respondents argue that the history of the Fourteenth Amendment is irrelevant to the District of Columbia case; yet on pages 17 and 18 of their original brief they argue that this history is relevant. We must presume then that counsel are abandoning that line of argument in their latest brief. In this latest brief on page 16 they proceed to analyze the effect of decrees in the four state cases and even to include segregation in all other areas in the United States as being involved in the decision and decree in this case. On page 17 of the brief counsel deal with "eighteen separate political subdivisions of the United States which would be obliged to make revolutionary changes in what has been described as 'a way of life' ". Again counsel for petitioners find it extremely difficult to answer as to any subdivisions or changes except those involved in the District of Columbia case. "The way of life" in the District of Columbia is completely nonsegregated except in education. We are unable to determine then to what "way of life" counsel for respondents refer in the District case.

Again on page 15 counsel for respondents say that petitioners will not suffer since there is no question of equality of facilities; here counsel do not address themselves to the issue of deprivation of liberty but are still arguing as if they are counsel in the four state cases and are enmeshed in the separate but equal philosophy growing out of the interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment and the so-called Plessy Doctrine. None of this is involved in the District case under the Fifth Amendment.

Respondents' counsel disclaim the possibility of bloodshed in effectuating integration in education, with which disclaimer we heartily agree. Subsequent references to possibilities of racial conflict and quotations from a decision by this Court in a case involving issues not even remotely related to any issues present in the instant case are irrelevant.

Counsel for respondents concede that should this Court invalidate enforced racial segregation in public education in the District of Columbia, the only delays in changing to an integrated system would be administrative in nature. Then they pose several administrative problems which they assume are present and assert that the time needed to solve them cannot be predicted. Had counsel for respondents conferred with their clients—the Board of Education—they would have been advised that substantial "indoctrination of teachers" is already an accomplished fact. They also would have been advised that their clients—the Board of Education—"will not be unprepared in the event that major changes in organization are required." Under administrative delays they list a substantial amount of time for indoctrination of teachers, the problem of locating instructors, and the necessity for securing appropriations from Congress to finance the program.

The fallacy of the argument that substantial time would be needed for indoctrination of teachers is demonstrated by (1) the existence of an integrated teachers union with several hundred members of both races, and by (2) reference to the present contacts of colored and white teachers in the two divisions of the public schools of the District of Columbia engaged in without untoward incident, on a wholly integrated basis. Approximately 80% of all the educational personnel in the District of Columbia public school system have served on one or more of these integrated committees:

American Friends office volunteers the opinion that over ninety per cent of the teachers of both divisions who have been trained in their seminars are equipped to carry on similar work in their own school buildings. Thus, the nucleus of 200 or so trained persons who will have had the benefit of seminars experience with the American Friends represent instructional resources in their respective buildings. Inasmuch as the selection of persons for the American Friends Seminars has been distributed as widely as possible among school buildings, the chances are that most faculties would have someone in their ranks with the proper conditioning for leadership. The American Friends office gives assurance that if called upon they could greatly augment their services and facilities for inter-group education in Washington. Likewise, it is probable that other similar resources could be expected to carry their share of the load including, for example, National Conference of Christians and Jews, the Anti-Defamation League, the American Association of University Women, the League of Women Voters.

Addressing ourselves to what the Corporation counsel refers to as being a second major consideration—the matter of teacher replacements and promotions—we find again an exaggerated statement of what as a matter of fact is a relatively minor problem. The Rules of the Board of Education, admittedly the controlling law, presently provide for and the annual practice carries out a merger of eligibility lists compiled from the results of competitive examinations given at different dates. It cannot reasonably be argued that the plan assumes any additional proportions because the individuals involved are of different races. All that the Board of Education need do is to amend its Rules and provide for the merger of these two lists and no time element is involved. Since promotions are presumably based upon merit no problem of time or of any other character can reasonably be posed for this so-called problem. To suggest that any considerable time would be consumed in locating instructors or working out the program for financing the integrated plan is negatived first by the personal relationships set forth above; secondly, by the fact that a large number of the teachers have already had courses in intergroup relations given by the American Friends Committee, American University, Catholic University, George Washington University and Howard University, in cooperation with the Board of Education. It is partially negatived, thirdly, by the fact that there is available from an original annual appropriation of $3000 for in-service training the sum of approximately $2000. A like sum of $3000 will become available for this purpose on July 1, 1954 in the pending appropriation bill.

The basic weakness of respondents position lies in the false assumption that because the Board rules have the effect of law the Board lacks power to amend or modify those rules. U. S. ex rel Denny v. Callahan, 54 App. D. C. 61,294 F. 992, cited by Respondent clearly recognizes the authority of the Board to exercise its discretion in the selection and appointment of teachers. In that case an applicant for a position, who was number one on the eligible list when a vacancy occurred, was denied the job. She then sued to obtain the position. While this suit was pending the Board changed the eligible list. The Court held that under those circumstances the Board could not do this.

Under the present rules of the Board as set forth in respondents' brief Appendix, p. 4, rule eleven at p. 5, and 6 provides for the merger of eligibility lists after each examination "irrespective of the date of examination." Certain it is that if the eligibility lists can be and have been merged without regard to date, merger without regard to race cannot present a serious obstacle to integration of personnel. The Court is asked to take judicial notice of the fact, well-known in the community, that the Board of Education intends to conduct its examination this school year of white and colored teachers of physical education by giving one and the same examination to both groups. (Minutes of Meeting of the Board of Education, June 24, 1953.)

Eligibility rosters in public employment are not unlike seniority rosters in private industry where it has long been the rule that although seniority is generally considered as a property right of an employee, it is nevertheless within the power of a union to modify or destroy an individual's seniority in a subsequent collective agreement. The analogous action in public employment is the modification of the statute or administrative order upon which the preferential right is based. So long as the modification is not arbitrary, no valid objection arises, Elder v. N. Y. Central R.R. Co., 152 F. 2d 361 (C.C.A. 6th 1945).

The most devastating rebuttal to the Corporation Counsel's contention that the District of Columbia is unprepared for the possibility of an immediate end of segregation in the public schools comes from the pen of his own client, the Superintendent of Schools, one of the respondents. In the "Report of the Superintendent of Schools to the Board of Education, 1952-1953," The Superintendent of Schools of the District of Columbia says at pages III and IV:

"During the past year the Board of Education, the Superintendent of Schools, and the school officers have concerned themselves with planning for the general reorganization of the schools which may be brought about as a result of the decision of the Supreme Court on the cases concerning segregation of the schools pending before it. Although there is no way to anticipate what decision the Court may render or the exact changes in organization which may be necessary as a result of its action, efforts are being made to be prepared for any eventuality. Consistent with this general plan the Board of Education invited the organized citizenry of Washington and any interested individuals to send to the Board of Education written statements expressing their ideas on the mechanics of integration of the schools should the present system of segregation be abolished by the Supreme Court's decision, and also on the methods to be employed to educate the public for any change which may be required. In response to this invitation 160 replies were received. In most instances groups and individuals sent in statements which were very helpful and which indicated thoughtful consideration of the question. These statements were analyzed and tabulated, and the various suggestions made have been and are being considered in connection with any planning for a change in school organization which may be necessitated by the Supreme Court's decision.

"Subsequently the Board of Education held a hearing to which it invited 30 leading citizens to appear before the Board to give their advice. This hearing, too, proved to be very helpful in planning for any changes which may be required.

"During the past several months the Superintendent and his staff have held a series of meetings to formulate plans, procedures, and techniques of transition from one type of organization to the other. This has been done so that the Superintendent will be ready to recommend to the Board certain changes should they be required. Obviously it is not known whether changes will be required by the decision and certainly the exact terms of transition cannot be known until the full text of the decision is made public.

> Should the Supreme Court rule against segregation it will be necessary that any plans that may have been evolved be revised in the light of the specific terms imposed by the decision. The Superintendent and the officers will not be unprepared in the event that major changes in the organization are required." (Emphasis supplied).

A revealing experiment in integration is available in the experience of the State of New Jersey. This eminently successful operation, involving forty-three school districts, including some large cities, a few fair-sized rural county seat towns, some small industrial areas, some agricultural townships and a few very high-level economic suburban communities, was accomplished in less than one year, except in the case of three districts where school buildings had to be constructed. The late Joseph S. Bustard, Assistant Commissioner of Education of the State of New Jersey, in commenting on this significant achievement in integration, on a state-wide basis in a complex situation, said:

> "While New Jersey cannot furnish any one formula, it can testify that complete integration in the public schools can and will work. It may even be safe to say once more, that the way to learn to do a thing is to do it, and in this respect, New Jersey has proven again that the best way to integrate is to do it." Bustard, "The New Jersey Story: The Development of Racially Integrated Public Schools." Journal of Negro Education, P. 285, Vol. 21, No. 3.

In the Brief on Reargument petitioners advanced the argument that the public policy of our national government as enunciated by the President and the public policy of the District of Columbia Government in process of effectuation are opposed to all governmental distinctions based on race or color. In their Brief on Reargument, page 18, counsel for respondents concede the factual support for this argument, and suggest no conclusion different from that drawn by petitioners. It is respectfully submitted therefore that counsel for respondents concede that the actions of respondents herein complained of are violative of national policy and as well of the public policy of the District of Columbia.

CONCLUSION

Petitioners believe that the other points advanced by respondents have been fully covered in petitioners' brief on the merits, and for that reason are not touched upon here.

Respectfully submitted,

GEORGE E. C. HAYES

BRIEF FOR PETITIONERS ON FURTHER REARGUMENT

On May 17th last, this Court disposed of the basic constitutional question presented by this case and companion cases by construing the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment and the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment as stripping federal and state governments of the power to require, authorize or permit the enforcement of racial segregation in the public schools. The Court said, moreover, that the formulation of decrees was made difficult "because these are class actions, because of the wide applicability of this decision and because of the great variety of local conditions ... We have now announced that [Segregation in public education] is a denial of the equal protection of the laws. In order that we may have the full assistance of the parties in formulating decrees, the cases will be restored to the docket, and the parties are requested to present further argument on Questions 4 and 5 previously propounded by the Court for the reargument this Term. The Attorney General of the United States is again invited to participate. The Attorneys General of the states requiring or permitting segregation in public education will also be permitted to appear as amici curiae upon request to do so by September 15, 1954, and submission on briefs by October 1, 1954."

Subsequently the time for filing of briefs for all parties was set for November 15, and these cases set down for re-argument December 6th.

QUESTIONS

Questions 4 and 5 left undecided, and now the subject of the discussion in this brief, follow:

4. Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment,

   (a) would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, or

   (b) may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?

5. On the assumption on which questions 4(a) and (b) are based, and assuming further that this Court will exercise its equity powers to the end described in question 4(b),

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(a) should this Court formulate detailed decrees in these cases;

(b) if so, what specific issues should the decrees reach;

(c) should this Court appoint a special master to hear evidence with a view to recommending specific terms for such decrees;

(d) should this Court remand to the courts of first instance with directions to frame decrees in these cases, and if so, what general directions should the decrees of the courts of first instance follow in arriving at the specific terms of more detailed decrees?

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

Since May 17th the School Board of the District of Columbia without awaiting a decree from this Court, has proceeded with implementation of a plan to desegregate the public school system of the District of Columbia. This so-called "Corning plan" has received wide publicity and has been referred to by many as a model plan for the desegregation of public school education. Since this Court is undoubtedly interested in what has taken place in the District of Columbia since its May 17th decision, we feel constrained to point out in some detail the development, modification, and operation of this plan. We likewise believe it will be of aid to the Court in its consideration of the answers to questions 4 and 5 to acquaint the Court with the framework within which this plan has been developed. In addition it also appears important to us that we give the Court our appraisal of this plan and its implementation. Under any thoughtful consideration of what has happened here, due deliberation must be given to the fact that this is the Nation's capital. It should also be borne in mind that the decision of May 17th is in line with the policy of the Federal Government.

These factors shed additional light on the events which have occurred since that decision. Any critical examination of what has taken place in the District of Columbia must be made in full awareness of the strong position taken by the President of the United States in not only urging immediate integration in the public schools of the District of Columbia but in also expressing the hope that the manner in which this transition from a segregated public school system to an integrated one might serve as a model for the rest of the country. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia took vigorous action in support of this position. The Corporation Counsel of the District of Columbia issued a clear cut opinion authorizing immediate action in the implementation of this position. The Board of Education then adopted a forthright and unequivocal policy calling for immediate integration. All of these actions occurred within the astonishingly short period of eight (8) days. It would also appear to us to be of some assistance to the Court to be advised that wherever unseasonable delay manifested itself in the plan proposed or in the steps taken in carrying out the plan that some one or more of these public officials or agencies insisted upon elimination of such delay and thus facilitated prompt action. It is in the light of this background that we wish to discuss with the Court the "Corning plan" and the steps taken thereunder in the District of Columbia.

DEVELOPMENT AND OPERATION OF THE CORNING PLAN

On December 17, 1952 the Board of Education directed Dr. Hobart Corning, the Superintendent, to formulate plans and to hold hearings on the integration of the then existing dual school system in the District of Columbia in the event that the Supreme Court should declare the dual school system to be unconstitutional. (Minutes of the Seventh (stated) meeting of the Board of Education, 1952-1953, held on December 17, 1952, p. 34.) The Superintendent pursuant to this directive invited suggestions with regard to desegregation from interested persons and community organizations. Numerous responses resulted from these invitations. These responses were analyzed and tabulated, and reported upon by Dr. Corning to the Board. The Board invited organizations and citizens to appear and submit further suggestions. The materials submitted were referred to the Superintendent for the attention of his staff, looking forward to the submission of a plan of desegregation by the Superintendent.

BLEED THROUGH

The Superintendent advised the Board at its meeting on December 16, 1953, that he planned "to set up a series of meetings in the general field of inter-cultural relationships . . . " (Superintendent's Circular No. 79, Appendix B, p. 33.)

From December, 1953 until May 1954, a program of inter-cultural education was carried on among Dr. Corning's staff and to a limited extent among the teaching personnel. The superintendent stated that the purpose of his activity was not to deal "with segregation or integration as such or with the advantages and disadvantages of either system, but that we are dealing rather with the problem of developing desirable human understandings and relationships as we live together and work together for the education of all the children—no matter under what general plan the schools are organized." (Ibid., p. 34.)

On the day this Court announced its opinion in this case, Superintendent Corning made a statement to the press that neither he nor the Board could do anything about desegregation until the Court had handed down its final decree. However, the next day, May 18, 1954, the District authorities decided not to wait for the re-arguments on the method and timing of integration nor for this Court's final decree. On that day the members of the Board of Education and Superintendent Corning, along with the Corporation Counsel for the District of Columbia, The Honorable Vernon West, met with the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. The Corporation Counsel advised them that the decision of this Court made Acts requiring separation of the races in public education unconstitutional; that the Board could determine the mechanics and time of integration; and that there was nothing to prevent the school authorities from desegregating as soon as they deemed advisable. At this meeting Commissioner Samuel Spencer disclosed that President Eisenhower had expressed the hope that the District would become a "model" for the nation in school integration. (Washington Post-Times Herald, May 19, 1954, p. 1 col. 7, p. 6 col. 3.)

The Board at its next regular meeting, May 19, 1954, decided to have a call meeting on May 25, 1954 for the purpose of hearing the Superintendent's report on the matter of desegregation of the public schools. A resolution was presented to the Board that "the Board enunciate in advance of the consideration of any plan proposed by the Superintendent, a clear and unequivocal statement of principles which shall govern in the adoption and execution of the Superintendent's proposed plan", and that the President appoint a special committee for the purpose of drafting such a set of principles for presentation to the Board at the May 25 meeting.

During the discussion of the resolution, the Superintendent strenuously objected to this proposal saying, ". . . he is wholly in accord with the establishment by the Board of an unequivocal set of principles. He stated further, however, that he has been working for weeks in the preparation of a set of principles to recommend to the Board and that he believed his report would be almost useless if the Board, prior to receiving his report, established a set of principles. He stated that his report is not a detailed administrative report except insofar as it illustrates how the principles would operate. He stated further that he was prepared to present to the Board at its special meeting on May 25, 1954, a specific set of principles with the firm recommendation that they be adopted as an unequivocal set of principles to govern the administrative procedures to follow. He stated that he had no objection to another set of principles being suggested, but that it was his thought that inasmuch as work had been put upon this matter of principles, he felt the Board should first give consideration to his report which the Board could amend, revise or eliminate."

"... The Superintendent stated that whatever principles are adopted and whatever administrative devices are applied will require a great deal of time beyond the establishment of principles."

The resolution was adopted by the Board and the committee was appointed. (Minutes of the Twelfth (stated) Meeting of the Board of Education, 1953-54, May 19, 1954.)

At its May 25th meeting the Board adopted the following policy:

> "In the light of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Bolling v. Sharpe, the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, believing it to be in the best interest of all citizens of the community of Washington, and necessary to the effective administration of an integrated system within the public schools, hereby adopts the following declaration of policy:
> 1. Appointments, transfers, preferments, promotions, ratings, or any other matters respecting the officers and employees of the Board shall be predicated solely upon merit and not upon race or color.
> 2. No pupil of the public schools shall be favored or discriminated against in any matter or in any manner respecting his or her relationship to the schools of the District of Columbia by reason of race or color.
> 3. Attendance of pupils residing within school boundaries, hereafter to be established, shall not be permitted at schools located beyond such boundaries, except for the most necessitous reasons or for the public convenience, and in no event for reasons related to the racial character of the school within the boundaries in which the pupil resides.

4. The Board believes that no record should be kept or maintained in respect to any pupil not enrolled in a public school on or prior to June 17, 1954, or in respect to any officer or employee not employed within the system on or prior to that date in which information is solicited or recorded relating to the color or race of any such person.

5. That the maximum efficient use shall be made of all physical facilities without regard to race or color.

In support of the foregoing principles, which are believed to be cardinal, the Board will not hesitate to use its full powers. It is pledged to a complete and wholehearted pursuit of these objectives.

We affirm our intention to secure the right of every child, within his own capacity to the full, equal and impartial use of all school facilities, and the right of all qualified teachers to teach where needed within the school system. And, finally, we ask the aid, cooperation and good-will of all citizens and the help of the Almighty in holding to our stated purposes." (Minutes of the 13th (Special) Meeting of the Board of Education, 1953-1954, held May 25, 1954, and Recessed Session held June 2, 1954, pp. A-8-9, App. pp. 1-15.)

After adopting this declaration of principles, the Superintendent was called upon to present his plan for integration. The "Corning Plan" was then presented by the Superintendent.

This plan was prefaced by the following statement:

1. Complete desegregation of all schools is to be accomplished with least possible delay.

Desegregation by grades or by levels would delay the process and would create administrative problems arising from confusion and inconsistencies.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

2. New boundaries are to be established for each school.

Definite boundaries will be established for each school to make the optimum use of the school by the pupils living in its immediate area.

In sections of the city where schools are located very close to each other it will be impossible to set up separate boundaries for each school. In such instances, therefore, the boundaries will be for groups of schools rather than for individual schools.

When the new boundaries have been established and the plan is in operation, adherence to the boundary limitations must be definite and without exception.

This does not mean, however, that there will be any change in the present practice of adjustments of any school boundaries by the Superintendent wherever changes in school population make such action necessary. These boundary readjustments during the period of transition to a desegregated system will probably be more frequent than they are at present.

3. Appointments and promotions of all school personnel are to be made on a merit system only and assignment will be in accord with the needs of the service.

The tenure rights of individuals as to salary level and rank will be maintained.

The duties of some officers will necessarily be changed.

4. The transition to a desegregated system is to be accomplished by natural and orderly means.

Artificial and immediate reassignments of large numbers of pupils, teachers, and officers would be disruptive and will be avoided." (Ibid., p. A. 16)

The report next proceeds with a consideration of the distribution of pupils and of school boundaries. The following criteria are provided for governing the distribution of pupils:

"1. the optimum use of all school buildings, and

2. the optimum accessibility of school buildings to the residences of pupils.

These criteria according to the plan necessarily require the establishment of definite zones to be served by each school or group of schools with the exception of the teachers colleges and the vocational and technical high schools which are specialized in nature and will continue to be city-wide in their services." (Ibid., p. A. 17)

This plan provides for an option for students presently enrolled in the District of Columbia system at any level to remain at the school until graduation from that level in order to avoid immediate displacement of large numbers of pupils. It provides the following procedures for carrying this out:

"1. Fixed zones are to be established for each elementary, junior high and senior high school to insure balanced use of school facilities.

2. All pupils new to the school system or to a particular school level will be assigned to the schools designated to serve the zones in which they live.

3. All pupils at present enrolled in a given school may remain until graduation provided the school is not overcrowded and provided the priority rights of pupils within the new boundaries of the school are not denied. If they prefer they may transfer to the school serving the zone in which they live. Elementary school pupils who change residence will be transferred to the school assigned to the area of the new residence.

4. Transfers from one school to another will be required when necessary to relieve overcrowded conditions." (Ibid., p. A. 17-18.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In keeping with the directions of the Board of Education the plan next set forth a proposed schedule (Ibid., pp. A. 21-25.) This schedule provided for the completion of the drawing of new boundaries for the public schools by September, 1954. (Ibid., p. A. 21.) It provided for limited transfers of elementary and junior high school pupils solely to relieve overcrowding by September, 1954. (Ibid., p. A. 21-22.) It further provided for a beginning of a merger of the McKinley and Armstrong technical high schools at the same time. (Ibid., p. A. 22.) In addition, provision was made for students of all races to attend the Miner and Wilson Teacher Colleges by September, 1954. (Ibid., p. A. 22-23.)

The plan next enumerated a series of administrative actions which needed to be taken which caused the Superintendent to feel that he could make no more progress toward desegregation in the public schools by September, 1954 than indicated in the paragraph above. He also indicated that the need for legislative changes supported this delay. (Ibid., p. A. 22.)

The plan continues with these observations:

> "If the Board approves the Superintendent's plan and if there are no such setbacks as the failure to secure such legislative changes as the Corporation Counsel deems necessary or to secure funds that may be necessary to accomplish the physical changes in schools and in the redistribution of classroom equipment and supplies, the Superintendent feels that he can complete the changeover to a desegregated system by September, 1955.
> "It is the belief of the Superintendent that he can not in September go beyond the steps outlined in this report because of the lack of sufficient time before the close of school in June as the presence of pupils, teachers, and officers is essential to the carrying out of these plans. The official school calendar specifies June 17, as the last day for pupils; June 18, as the last day for teachers; and July 1 through August 31, as the summer vacation period for field officers. The field officers are, of course, subject to call during this vacation period if their services are needed." (Ibid., p. A. 23-24.)

As regards personnel, the Superintendent set no dates, but stated that persons presently employed would not be moved immediately, and that new personnel would be assigned in accordance with the needs of the service. Staff personnel would continue to exercise their current functions. (Ibid., pp. A. 19-21.)

The Board heard the Superintendent read this report and immediately recessed until June 2. On June 2 the Board met and discussed the Superintendent's report—that is the "Corning Plan" as described above. (Ibid., pp. A. 35-61). The Superintendent then submitted a statement to the Board in which he sought to justify the validity of the "option" plan and to further support his position that it was administratively impossible to put his plan into effect in September, 1954, except for the emergency transfers indicated above. In this statement the Superintendent conceded that he could establish new school boundaries by July 1, 1954; but, he stressed vigorously his viewpoint that it was administratively impossible to make any significant assignment of pupils by September, 1954. In this statement it was pointed out that emergency transfers referred to would provide for the transfer of about 2,700 Negro pupils into the previously all-white elementary and junior high schools. (Ibid., pp. A. 62-66.)

The Superintendent's report of May 25 was accepted and filed and Dr. Corning was instructed to complete the designation of school boundaries and present maps to the Board on July 1 and to submit to the Board on June 23 a specific schedule covering the steps in desegregation. (Ibid., p. A. 74.)

In the Board Meeting of June 23, 1954, Superintendent Corning outlined the steps in the desegregation program which had been taken and were to be accomplished, with their respective dates. (Ibid., A. 41-46.) The schedule has been carried out to date except in instances and manners as hereinafter noted:

June 8	Temporary reorganization of the two Boards of Examiners into one Board under the direct chairmanship of the Superintendent.
June 10, 11, 12	Teacher examinations for elementary, junior high, and vocational high schools on a completely integrated basis.
June 11	Notices sent to all high school principals announcing that both Miner and Wilson Teachers Colleges are receiving applications for admission in September from any qualified person, regardless of race.
June 11	Instructions issued to Heads of Departments of Military Science and Tactics to prepare and submit suggested plan for integration of cadet program for 1954-55 school year.
June 14	Meeting of First Assistant and Associate Superintendents concerned, Directors of Health, Physical Education, Athletics, and Safety, and Directors of Athletics to discuss all sports programs for 1954-55 school year. Directors of Athletics to report back on June 24 with suggested schedules.
June 14	First field officer examination announced on a city-wide basis (five such announcements issued to date).
June 15	Completion of tabulation and listing of data from registration cards for approximately 100,000 pupils.
June 17	Preliminary steps completed to effect transfers of pupils in elementary, junior high, and senior high schools listed in Superintendent's report of May 25 (Proposed Schedule, pp. 7-8)
June 23	Revised legislative language submitted to the Board covering necessary amendments to existing law because of Supreme Court decision—

Concerning First Assistant Superintendent
Concerning Chief Examiners
Concerning Board of Examiners Concerning School Censuses

July 1	Superintendent to submit to Board maps and descriptive data to show new boundary lines for all elementary, junior high and senior high schools.
July 1	All necessary data concerning new boundaries to be furnished school principals and press to insure publicity reaching all school personnel and patrons.
	Superintendent to submit recommendations for merging of all lists of persons eligible for appointment to all teacherships on all levels.
September 1	Use of new boundaries on all levels for all pupils new to the public schools including kindergarten and first grade pupils entering the public schools for the first time.
	(12,000 children affected. Change moved up by three months and put into operation.)
September 13	Evening schools to open for operation on an integrated basis.
September 13	Transfers of selected Division 2 elementary school pupils who, because of present boundaries, are required to travel excessive distances where there are present Division 1 schools near their homes. This is possible as it involves a limited number of pupils and in no instance will require reorganization in a school receiving pupils or the transfer of furniture or equipment.
	(Approximately three hundred transferred.)
	(Pupil changes and transfers were made in the elementary schools, junior high schools, senior high schools, teachers colleges and evening schools. Estimated number of pupils transferred was 2903.)
September 13	Completion of building organizations including the transfer of teachers in some schools.
September 13	Completion of transfer of furniture and equipment and textbooks and classroom supplies between schools affected by pupil transfers.
October 1-15	Explain to all pupils the options provided either for remaining in present schools or transferring to new schools. (Prior to this date, this phase was accelerated.)
	Hold meetings for parents of all children who are qualified to request options to explain the choices

BLEED THROUGH

although no assurance can at that time be given whether the options can be approved for February 1 or for a later date.
(Meetings of parents not held as provided for.)

Written statements to be filed not later than November 11 confirming all options requested. Sixth, ninth and twelfth grade pupils not to be transferred.

(Transfers not made in the sixth, ninth and twelfth grade pupils, except in instances showing hardships. Senior High, 400 Negroes transferred to white school. Junior High, 525 Negroes transferred to white school. Elementary, 900 Negroes transferred to white school.)

The Superintendent repeats his desire to take such additional progressive steps as are consistent with the welfare of the children. He will, therefore, examine and tabulate all the written options that are filed to determine the numbers of pupils residing outside the new boundaries who wish to remain in their present schools and the numbers of those who wish to transfer to the schools serving their residence areas. On the basis of these findings he will then make such changed pupil assignments as are found feasible without forced transfers at the beginning of the new semester in February.

(Transfers being made with changes of address and in accord with zoning for new pupils)

On September 22, 1954, Superintendent Corning summarized the progress made in desegregating the public schools. He reported that the following things had been accomplished: (1) Schools reorganized; (2) Teachers' eligible register merged and appointments made therefrom; (3) Pupils transferred in accordance with the administration's plans; (4) Furniture, etc. moved; (5) Faculties in more than one-fifth of the schools rendered bi-racial; (6) Committee set up to consider "hardship cases," received about 700 requests for relief, processed about 500, granted about 60%, rejected about 10 percent and placed the remaining 30% under the "option" category to be disposed of later; (7) new kindergartners, new first graders and all pupils attending Washington schools for the first time assigned on the basis of the new boundaries; (8) more than 3000 elementary and junior high school pupils transferred to new schools to relieve over-crowding; (9) about 100 children transferred to avoid necessity of travelling long distances; (10) Youth Council Centers established at Thomson and Walker-Jones Schools [student bodies bi-racial not faculties]; (11) 20 mentally retarded children and 3 special teachers assigned to the Military Road School [actually only 8 pupils—3 Negro and 5 white—and 3 teachers—2 Negro and 1 white—were assigned here]; (12) merging of McKinley and Armstrong started with a transfer of several hundred (346) children to McKinley; (13) Miner and Wilson Teachers Colleges opened to all qualified applicants [no whites at Miner, 32 Negroes at Wilson]; (14) all evening schools opened on an integrated basis; (15) on September 20 about 460 applications for transfers on the basis of options filed by senior high school pupils [467 eventually granted]; (16) on September 27, 560 applications filed by junior high school pupils [488 eventually granted]; (17) on September 27, about 2400 applications filed by elementary school pupils [none granted, at first because a strike against desegregation existed in the secondary schools, later about 900 transfers in the secondary schools effected, the remainder not acted upon.] (Minutes of the Fourth (Stated) Meeting of the Board of Education, 1954-55, September 22, 1954, pp. A. 18-22. Matters in brackets obtained by us from the District of Columbia School Officials.)

We turn now to an appraisal of the "Corning Plan", and our answers to Questions Four and Five propounded by this Court.

ARGUMENT

I

In Answer to Question 4a This Court Must, and in Answer to Question 4b This Court Should Issue a Decree Ordering Forthwith Desegregation of the Public School System of the District of Columbia.

Again stated, Question 4 is:

4. Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment,

(a) would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, or

(b) may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?

With respect to these questions petitioners reaffirm the views set forth in their brief on reargument heretofore submitted[1] wherein it is urged that this Court should by its decree direct respondents forthwith to admit petitioners to schools of their choice within the limits of normal geographic school districting. This Court, having decided that segregation in public schools is violative of the Fifth Amendment should decree that respondents, lacking the constitutional power to assign pupils to public schools on the basis of race, immediately cease and desist using race as a factor in making such assignments.

Supporting of that position are the cases decided by this Court enunciating the proposition that the rights here involved are personal and present. Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U.S. 629, 635; Sipuel v. Board of Regents, 332 U.S. 631, 633; Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 350 U.S. 337, 352; Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483; Bolling v. Sharpe, 347

[1] Brief for Petitioners on Reargument No. 8, October Term, 1953, pp. 89-94.

U.S. 497. The present, personal rights of children who are growing through their formative years necessitate forthwith vindication if they are not to be irretrievably lost.

Petitioners also adopt the arguments urged in the joint brief filed by the pupils and parents in the State cases. Further, petitioners reaffirm the position taken in their brief on reargument hereinbefore mentioned which is in essence that no power exists in this Court to postpone the enjoyment by petitioners of rights constitutionally protected, especially where, as here, the unconstitutional conduct of respondents is causing injury to the most important secular claims that can be put forward by children, the claim to their full measure of the opportunity to learn and grow, and to be treated as entire citizens of the society into which they have been born. In the words of the Delaware Court:

> ". . . To require the plaintiffs to wait another year under present conditions would be in effect partially to deny them that to which we have held they are entitled." Gebhart v. Belton, 91 A. (2d) 137, 149.

Moreover, even should this Court conclude that its equity powers do permit an ending of a segregated school system to be accomplished by means of an effective gradual adjustment, assay of the factors involved makes it clear that in the District of Columbia it would be both unnecessary and unwise to exercise such powers. The factual situation in the District of Columbia makes a gradual decree unnecessary. Racial segregation has disappeared from virtually every phase of life in the District where Negroes and whites live side by side, work together, dine together and recreate in the same places and in general live their lives without racial distinction, save in the public schools. As has been heretofore indicated, since May 17, 1954 the great majority of individuals and organizations in the District have worked and are working with great zeal to achieve the implementation of this Court's decision without awaiting the decree of this Court. In this atmosphere it is submitted that it would be an unwise exercise of equity powers were this Court to do other than grant a forthwith decree.

In specific implementation of their answer to question four (b) and as an aid to the Court in its consideration thereof, petitioners would like to call to the attention of the Court the experience in the District of Columbia with the Corning Plan for desegregation of the District school system.

This Court has questioned whether it might permit a gradual adjustment from a segregated school system to one not based upon race. We have already indicated that in our opinion no power exists in the Court to postpone relief and we address ourselves to that question on the assumption that the Court finds that such power does exist. Even if this Court finds that such powers exist, we submit, that the power should not be exercised in this case. It needs no citation of authority to establish that the defendant in equity who asks the chancellor to go slowly in upholding the adjudicated vital rights of children accruing to them under the Constitution must make out an affirmative case of crushing conviction to sustain his plea for delay.

The experience in the District of Columbia with the Corning Plan substantiates the empirical studies of actual cases of desegregation of public schools and other social institutions, and rebuts the possibility that an affirmative case can be made out to prove that there is any compelling and valid justification which would sustain the delay implicit in the plan.[2]

At the very outset we desire to make our position clear that we do not agree with counsel for the respondents in their publicized position that desegregation of the public schools in the District of Columbia has been accomplished in compliance with the pronouncement of this Court in its decision of May 17th. It is our appraisal of the plan put in operation in the District of Columbia that respondents have advanced on the assumption that this Court has accepted the theory of an effective gradual adjustment of the transition from a segregated system to a system not based on color distinctions and they have discounted the propriety of a forthwith disposal of this matter upon its merits, and have launched upon this gradual plan which is replete with errors and pitfalls. There is a basic inconsistency between the protestations of immediacy by the respondents and the gradualism contained in the program and demonstrated in its operation.

The inequities and partial or complete denial of constitutional rights which are necessarily inherent in any plan providing for postponement of constitutional rights are highlighted by a discussion and critique of the "Corning Plan" as administered by the District of Columbia which plan contains elements of both forthwith desegregation and gradualism. Here the gradualist element has caused not only a denial of present constitutional rights to some pupils, but has also been the genesis of many administrative difficulties in the past. It presages many more difficulties for the future, most all of which would be avoided by the adoption of a forthwith plan.

The principal areas of objections to the Corning Plan are (1) the delay in completely desegregating the public school system and (2) the insertion of a plan of student options designed to defeat effective desegregation as contemplated by the May 17th decision and by the policy declaration of the Board.

(1) An examination of proposals and statements of Superintendent Corning indicates that administratively he was of the opinion that the only desegregation which could take place in the District by September 1954, was the limited desegregation involved in relieving overcrowding; the merging of Armstrong and McKinley; and the opening of Wilson and Miner Teachers Colleges without regards to race. As a matter of fact, the Superintendent stated that he could not even draw boundary lines before September 1954. But when the Board took its position and told Dr. Corning to act forthwith, the Superintendent found that he could draw the boundary lines by July 1, 1954, and could partially desegregate in all levels by September, 1954, which he accordingly did. That is, the Superintendent took an administrative position of gradualism from which he receded step by step. The experience here in the District of Columbia demonstrated that extended time to desegregate was not necessary, which is in line with the results of studies made in the field of desegregation.[3]

It should be noted in this connection that part of the administrative indecision and delay was repeatedly justified by Dr. Corning on the basis that he was acting in advance of a final decree in this case.

It is the petitioners position that the Corning Plan taken out of its setting and transplanted into another would occasion greater delay, confusion, and extended, if not complete, denial of constitutional rights.

We should like to call the attention of the Court to the repeated statements by the Superintendent of Schools that certain steps in desegregation were necessary because they were educationally sound, not for the purpose of discrediting the Superintendent, but for the purpose of emphasizing to the Court that claims of educational unsoundness as justification for delay and other administrative actions are, to say the least, unreliable.

(2) The provision for an option, which the Superintendent engrafted upon a boundary system, created anticipated confusion and so-called hardship cases. It was difficult for some and impossible for others to understand the operation of this phase of the plan, so that many did not exercise these options because they did not know whether they could, or when they could, exercise them. Some people did not exercise the option to remove their children from the school they had been attending outside the new boundary to the school within the new boundary for fear of the hostility which would be accorded the children in the new school because they would be "bumping" former students. This piecemeal desegregation thus produced the very ills forecast by the experts.[4]

The option provision in effect takes the authority to operate an orderly integrated system from the Superintendent and delegates it to the parents of each child. The option plan has not in fact operated as Dr. Corning has promised that it would. At one place in the plan we find this language:

> "Any child living in the area of School "A" may attend that school if he so desires even though he may now be enrolled in School "B" or in some other school.
> "It should be noted that all children living within the boundaries of any given school will have first priority for attending that school."

This on its face seems a fair proviso but the application of the rule, with the required sanction of the Superintendent, is having the following demonstrated result: Child John Doe (Negro) lives now in an area within the boundaries serviced by School A (white) and expresses the desire to go to School A. The Superintendent denies this right on the ground that School A will be overcrowded by that transfer, although the place which John Doe seeks to occupy is being held by one or more children (white) who live outside of the area of School A. In others words, exactly contrary to the wording of the plan, the preference is given to the child outside of the boundaries of the school. Thus attendance with race fundamentally as the controlling factor is being perpetuated. That this is designedly done and that there is no immediate relief in sight is voiced by the Superintendent himself in his announced projected plan:

> "The Superintendent repeats his desire to take such additional progressive steps as are consistent with the welfare of the children. He will, therefore, examine and tabulate all the written options that are filed to determine the numbers of pupils residing outside the new boundaries who wish to remain in their present schools and the numbers of those who wish to transfer to the schools serving their residence areas. On the basis of these findings he will then make such changed pupil assignments as are found feasible without forced transfers at the beginning of the new semester in February."

Our investigation discloses no instance where a single Negro child has been transferred from a school which he has previously attended because of race to a school from which he was previously excluded because of race where to do so would have meant the displacement of a white student. To the contrary, we have come upon instances where white children required by Board rules to attend schools formerly all Negro have been permitted to transfer to schools predominantly white on the alleged ground of "hardship". We respectfully submit that this so-called "hardship" is nothing less than having to attend a public school within his boundary where his racial group is in the minority. The granting of such transfers by the School Administrator is an admission and acceptance of this as hardship. In addition, the granting of such transfers is assigning students on the basis of race in contravention of this Court's decision of May 17th, and in violation of the expressed policy of the Board of Education stated in the following language:

> "Attendance of pupils residing within school boundaries, hereafter to be established, shall not be permitted at schools located beyond such boundaries, except for the most necessitous reasons or for the public convenience, and in no event for reasons related to the racial character of the school within the boundaries in which the pupil resides." (Minutes of the 13th (Special) meeting of the Board of Education, 1953-1954, held May 25, 1954, p. A 8.)

This is further evidence that this plan not only embraces the principles of gradualism but fosters the denial of effective desegregation.

It appears to us that the Corning Plan as evolved and operated in the District of Columbia tends to nullify the decision of May 17th in two ways: (1) The option features of the plan operate to fasten aspects of the segregated system upon the purportedly desegregated system, and (2) the lack of known standards by which the administrators of the plan are to determine when desegregation is to take effect and why desegregation is to be delayed subject petitioners declared constitutional rights to the uncertain whims and caprice of school authorities, and argues for a forthwith decree, rather than a decree permitting gradualism.

II

If This Court Should Decide to Permit an "Effective Gradual Adjustment" From a Segregated School System to a System Not Based on Color Distinctions, It Should Not Formulate a Detailed Decree But Should Remand This Case to the Court of First Instance With Specific Directions.

In addressing themselves to the problems posed by the several parts of Question 5, petitioners submit that a crucial factor in determining the kind and character of decree which this Court should enter, is the factor of respondents' actions taken and proposed as hereinabove described looking toward the de-segregation of the public schools in the District of Columbia. Based on respondents' own prognosis the outer limit in point of time required for the necessary adjusment of the school system from a segregated system to one not based on race or color is September, 1955. Inasmuch as the bulk of the deficiencies in the proposed plan to which petitioners have called attention are deletions, their adoption will not extend but tend to shorten the time needed for transition. An additional factor which is submitted as a consideration underlying the choice of form of decree is the atmosphere of integration, to which attention has been called, extant in the District of Columbia.

For the reasons enumerated above it would appear crystal clear that it would be injudicious for this Court to undertake the formulation of a detailed decree in this case. Neither is it needful that the decree reach the specifics which have been considered by the Board of Education and implemented by its action. Nor should this Court appoint a special master since all pertinent evidence is already before this Court and is of record for the use both of this Court and the District Court as well.

It is petitioners' position that this Court should issue its mandate directing that the District Court enter a decree enjoining respondents forthwith from imposing distinctions based on race or color in the administration of the public schools of the District of Columbia and directing that each child eligible for public school attendance in the District of Columbia be admitted to the school of his choice not later than September, 1955, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting.

CONCLUSION

It is respectfully submitted that in light of the decisions of this Court to the effect that respondents lack the constitutional power to use race or color as a basis for the administering of the public schools in the District of Columbia and that it is in violation of Petitioners' rights under the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States to be excluded from any of such schools on the basis of race or color, this Court should therefore by its mandate require the entry of a forthwith decree restraining Respondents from using distinctions based on race or color in the administration and operation of the public school system in the District of Columbia.

Respectfully submitted,

APPENDIX A

Extracts from the Minutes of The Board of Education of the District of Columbia

SUPERINTENDENT OF SCHOOLS
FRANKLIN ADMINISTRATION BUILDING
THIRTEENTH AND K STREETS N. W.
WASHINGTON 5, D. C.

May 25, 1954

To the Board of Education
of the District of Columbia

Ladies and Gentlemen:

On Monday, May 17, 1954, the Supreme Court of the United States issued two opinions, one having to do with segregation in public schools in Kansas, South Carolina, Virginia, and Delaware, and the other with segregated schools in the District of Columbia. The first opinion declared that "such segregation is a denial of the equal protection of the laws" and the second opinion stated:

> "In view of our decision that the Constitution prohibits the states from maintaining racially segregated public schools, it would be unthinkable that the same Constitution would impose a lesser duty on the Federal Government. We hold that racial segregation in the public schools of the District of Columbia is a denial of the due process of law guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution."

The latter opinion also restored to the docket of the Court the case of Brown v. the Board of Education for further argument next fall on certain aspects of the suit. This opinion placed upon the Board of Education and the Superintendent of Schools the responsibility for accomplishing the complete de-segregation of all public schools in the District of Columbia.

The transition from a segregated to a de-segregated type of school organization requires definite administrative decisions and practices. To accomplish the transition in Washington as rapidly and effectively as possible, basic principles need to be established which will govern all administrative procedures necessary in complying with the opinion of the Court. The Superintendent and his staff state as a basic premise that the schools will hereafter operate as a single system and that no reference will be made in any way to racial differences among its pupils or its employees.

The following general principles are calculated to make the best use of the total resources of the school system in plant and personnel, to serve the best interest of all the pupils, and to promote the general welfare of the community. To implement these principles, administrative attention must be directed toward steps which will assure the distribution of pupils and the assignment of employed personnel smoothly and expeditiously. These general principles are presented to the Board of Education for its consideration.

1. Complete de-segregation of all schools is to be accomplished with least possible delay.

   De-segregation by grades or by levels would delay the process and would create administrative problems arising from confusion and inconsistencies.

2. New boundaries are to be established for each school.

   Definite boundaries will be established for each school to make the optimum use of the school by the pupils living in its immediate area.

   In sections of the city where schools are located very close to each other it will be impossible to set up separate boundaries for each school. In such instances, therefore, the boundaries will be for groups of schools rather than for individual schools.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

When the new boundaries have been established and the plan is in operation, adherence to the boundary limitations must be definite and without exception. This does not mean, however, that there will be any change in the present practice of adjustments of any school boundaries by the Superintendent wherever changes in school population make such action necessary. These boundary readjustments during the period of transition to a de-segregated system will probably be more frequent than they are at present.

3. Appointments and promotions of all school personnel are to be made on a merit system only and assignment will be in accord with the needs of the service.

The tenure rights of individuals as to salary level and rank will be maintained.

The duties of some officers will necessarily be changed.

4. The transition to a de-segregated system is to be accomplished by natural and orderly means.

Artificial and immediate reassignments of large numbers of pupils, teachers, and officers would be disruptive and will be avoided.

SCHOOL BOUNDARIES AND DISTRIBUTION OF PUPILS

One very significant aspect of the process of de-segregation is that concerned with the distribution of pupils among the various schools. It is evident that the reasonable and proper criteria for this distribution are:

1. the optimum use of all school buildings, and
2. the optimum accessibility of school buildings to the residences of pupils.

These criteria necessarily require the establishment of definite zones to be served by each school or group of schools. The teachers colleges and the vocational and technical high schools because they are specialized in nature will continue to be city-wide in their services. In establishing zones for the optimum use of all school buildings, the objective will be to assign to each given school or group of schools an area calculated to give each building its fair share of the total pupil load in relation to its capacity.

Although it will not be possible to avoid all traffic hazards or to assure convenient public transportation in every case in considering the accessibility of a school account will be taken of these factors as well as the factor of distance to be travelled by the pupils.

To facilitate the establishment of proper boundaries for all school buildings on a de-segregated basis, the residence cards for all pupils now in the Washington public schools have been set up on the IBM accounting machines according to city blocks, by grade levels, and by schools now attended. In addition thereto each building principal is preparing a spot map to indicate the places of residence of all his pupils. The officers charged with the responsibility of establishing the boundaries will then be able to determine the number of pupils now enrolled in the schools who live in any given city block. They will also know the grade level and the school last attended by each pupil. The compilation of these data will assist in the establishment of the boundary limitations.

In order to provide stability, continuity, and security in the educational experiences of pupils during the transition period, it is agreed that it will be educationally sound to permit pupils at present enrolled in any school to continue in that school even though they are not living within the new boundaries. By this means immediate displacement of unnecessarily large numbers of pupils will be avoided. Progressively with the establishment of new boundaries all children will attend the schools serving the areas in which they live.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The following procedures will be needed to carry out this plan:

1. Fixed zones are to be established for each elementary, junior high and senior high school to insure balanced use of school facilities.

2. All pupils new to the school system or to a particular school level will be assigned to the schools designated to serve the zones in which they live.

3. All pupils at present enrolled in a given school may remain until graduation provided the school is not overcrowded and provided the priority rights of pupils within the new boundaries of the school are not denied. If they prefer they may transfer to the school serving the zone in which they live. Elementary school pupils who change residence will be transferred to the school assigned to the area of the new residence.

4. Transfers from one school to another will be required when necessary to relieve overcrowded conditions.

In order to demonstrate how these procedures will operate, the Superintendent suggests that the cases of the boundaries of two hypothetical schools (elementary, junior high or senior high) be considered: School "A", formerly a Division 1 school, and School "B", formerly a Division 2 school, serving areas within their new boundaries on a desegregated basis, the two areas being contiguous.

By the application of the foregoing procedures, what children must attend and what children may attend School "A"?

These must attend School "A"

1. All children living within the new boundaries who formerly attended School "A".

2. All children living within the new boundaries who are entering a school of that level for the first time.

3. All children who are newly residing in the area served by School "A".

4. Children now attending School "B" but living within the boundaries of School "A" if School "B" becomes overcrowded.

Those who may attend School "A"

1. Children now enrolled in School "A" whether or not their residence is within the boundaries of School "A" may continue to attend until their graduation subject to the following conditions:

   a. if School "A" becomes overcrowded, pupils previously attending School "A" who live in the area now served by School "B" or any other school will be transferred to that school.

   b. if further relief from overcrowding is necessary after all children not living in the area served by School "A" have been transferred, it will then be necessary to provide additional relief by further changing the boundaries of School "A".

2. Any child living in the area of School "A" may attend that school if he so desires even though he may now be enrolled in School "B" or in some other school.

It should be noted that all children living within the boundaries of any given school will have first priority for attending that school.

These same regulations will apply to School "B", and to all other elementary, junior high or senior high schools in the city except those which are city-wide in their services.

The ultimate distribution of pupils strictly in accordance with established zones will be accomplished through the provisions of the principle that all pupils entering the elementary, junior high, or senior high schools for the first time shall be assigned to the schools designated to serve the zones of their residences. This applies equally to pupils entering the first grade, pupils promoted to junior high or senior high schools, pupils entering the Washington Public Schools for the first time, and pupils transferring from one area of the city to another.

Finally, authority for the placement of all pupils must be vested in the Superintendent of Schools and his staff, who will administer the plan within the framework of the policies enunciated by the Board of Education.

ASSIGNMENT OF EDUCATIONAL EMPLOYEES

A second major aspect of the process of de-segregation is that dealing with the distribution of the teachers, including librarians and counselors. The following procedures are recommended to govern the assignment of these employees. Here again it is felt that once policies are established through formal action of the Board of Education the school administration shall then be vested with final authority for determining the placement of school employees.

1. Teachers now in service.

In general these employees will remain in their present assignments subject to the following conditions.

a. They will be transferred only to meet the needs of the service and then only within the level and/or the subject matter fields of their preparation and experience.

b. When vacancies occur or when there is need for additional teachers in a given school, assignments to that school will be determined in accordance with the best use of available personnel. As is true at present, a controlling consideration in the placement of personnel will be the general fitness and adaptability of a individual for a particular situation.

c. Requests of teachers for transfers will be honored as at present if the transfers are in accordance with the needs of the overall school organization.

2. Appointment and placement of teachers new to the service.

a. All appointments of teachers will be made from rated lists resulting from examinations to be held by a single Board of Examiners.

b. All assignments of new personnel will be in accordance with the needs of the service.

Another important aspect in the de-segregation process is the assignment of field officers. Since most of them are specialists in their field it is essential that consideration be given their training and experience.

1. Principals and Assistant Principals now in service.

The procedure for the assignment of assistant principals and principals now in the service will be the same as that prescribed for teachers.

2. Directors, Assistant Directors, Heads of Departments, and other field officers.

Directors, assistant directors, and heads of departments, who at present serve the system on a divisional basis will be assigned to duties in the same fields of work on a city-wide basis. The duties of most of these positions fall logically into large areas, such as administration, supervision and improvement of instruction, and curriculum revision. Each of these officers will be assigned to some such area in his field on a city-wide basis and will serve all levels of the system.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

3. Personnel in special departments and offices now operating on a divisional basis will be reassigned on a city-wide basis.

4. Newly appointed officers in these groups will be selected according to merit under the existing procedures for the selection and promotion of persons for officer positions, but on a system-wide basis.

The Superintendent is not yet prepared to make recommendations as to any formal changes in the functions of the officers on his staff. The work involved in accomplishing de-segregation in so large a school system will require the closely-knit and joint efforts of all these officers for a considerable period of time. They have been engaged in working out the detailed preparation of this plan and it will require their continued cooperative efforts in its inauguration. The responsibilities and duties of such officers as the Assistant to the Superintendent in charge of Business Administration, the Associate Superintendent in charge of Buildings and Grounds, and the Associate Superintendent in charge of Personnel are already city-wide in scope. The work which is at present the responsibility of the officers in charge of instruction and school administration and of educational research will in no wise be lessened by the change in the school system. It is the plan of the Superintendent to assign these officers eventually to duties that will be broadened and on a system-wide basis and which will provide opportunity for the initiation of new services and the development of others not at present sufficiently emphasized. These reassignments will result in considerably improved supervisory and administrative practices in the classrooms of all levels.

PROPOSED SCHEDULE

To begin the implementation of the plan to de-segregate the public schools of the District of Columbia, the Superintendent proposes the following tentative schedule:

By September, 1954—

Completion by the building principals and their supervisory officers of the establishment of new boundaries for all schools except those that will continue to function on a city-wide basis.

Relief of present urgent situations in:

1. Elementary Schools

a. To relieve overcrowding transfer a sufficient number of pupils:

from the Slowe and Noyes Schools to the Woodridge, Langdon, and Burroughs Schools from the Bruce, Monroe, and Park View Schools to the Raymond, Petworth, Barnard, and Rudolph Schools

from the Madison, Maury, and Lovejoy Schools to the Kingsman, Edmonds, and Blair Schools

from the Taylor, Hayes and Ludlow Schools to the Wheatley School

from the Bryan and the Payne Schools to the Buchanan School from the River Terrace School to the Benning School.

b. To vacate the Military Road School, no longer needed for classroom purposes, transfer the pupils from that school to the Brightwood School.

2. Junior High Schools

a. To alleviate overcrowding transfer pupils:

from the Randall Junior High School to the Jefferson Junior High School

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

from the Kelly Miller Junior High School to the Sousa Junior High School.

NOTE: These transfers of elementary and junior high school pupils are proposed by the Superintendent because of almost emergency situations and in his opinion are deserving of approval at this time as first steps in the complete de-segregation process. He feels that no cases beyond these should be considered at this time.

3. Senior High Schools

Begin the merging of the McKinley and Armstrong Technical High Schools by transferring to McKinley students in such courses as can be accommodated in the present classroom and shop facilities.

NOTE: The complete merger of these two schools will depend upon appropriation of necessary funds for construction and moving and purchase of equipment.

4. Teachers Colleges

While there is no urgent situation in the college enrollments, it is proposed that both Wilson and Miner Teachers College be opened to qualified students regardless of race and that the two institutions plan special course offerings so that students in either one will be able to take advantage of such offerings in the other. A complete merging of the colleges cannot be accomplished at this time since there is not at present any building available which can accommodate so large an institution.

Attention is called to the fact that the suggestions proposed above providing for de-segregation in certain areas of the school system are in advance of any present requirement of the Supreme Court Opinion.

After the opening of the schools in September, the Superintendent will continue as rapidly as possible with the whole program, taking into consideration the necessary steps, the most important of which are listed below:

1. Assigning pupils to schools on basis of new boundaries.
2. Preparing Board Orders for changed assignments of teachers and officers where necessary.
3. Carrying on programs of in-service training in intercultural relationships for all employees.
4. Conducting examinations based on amended legislation.
5. Establishing new eligible lists for teacher appointments.
6. Replanning city-wide student activities, such as sports, cadets, student government, and musical activities.
7. Relocating all field officers now occupying space which will be required for classroom use.
8. Making adjustments in allotments for postage, stores-clerks, and evening schools.
9. Moving furniture and classroom equipment.
10. Arranging for adjustments in the delivery of classroom supplies and textbooks to meet changed school enrollments.
11. Recommending to the Board necessary changes in its rules.

If the Board approves the Superintendent's plan and if there are no such setbacks as the failure to secure such

BLEED THROUGH

legislative changes as the Corporation Counsel deems necessary or to secure funds that may be necessary to accomplish the physical changes in schools and in the redistribution of classroom equipment and supplies, the Superintendent feels that he can complete and change over to a de-segregated system by September, 1955.

It is the belief of the Superintendent that he cannot in September go beyond the steps outlined in this report because of the lack of sufficient time before the close of school in June as the presence of pupils, teachers and officers is essential to the carrying out of these plans. The official school calendar specifies June 17, as the last day for pupils; June 18, as the last day for teachers; and July 1 through August 31, as the summer vacation period for field officers. The field officers are, of course, subject to call during this vacation period if their services are needed.

The Superintendent submits this report for the consideration of the Board and recommends its approval. For the convenience of the Board he recapitulates below the specific recommendations that will require Board approval before he can begin the administrative steps looking to the actual de-segregation of the public schools of the District of Columbia:

1. As a basic premise, that the public schools operate hereafter as a single system without reference of any kind to or consideration of racial differences among its pupils or its employees.

2. That complete de-segregation be accomplished with the least possible delay according to the suggested scheduled steps.

3. That the transition to a de-segregated system be made by natural and orderly means.

4. That new boundaries be established for each school to provide the optimum use of all buildings and the optimum accessibility of schools to the places of residence of pupils.

5. That the assignments of pupils to schools be made on the basis of the steps outlined in the section, "School Boundaries and Distribution of Pupils," and according to the calendar established in the schedule.

6. That all appointments, promotions, and assignments of school personnel be made on the basis of merit only and in accordance with the needs of the service.

7. That the assignments of teachers, librarians, counselors, and field officers be made according to the policies outlined in the section, "Assignment of Educational Employees."

8. That members of the Superintendent's immediate staff continue in their present assignments until the whole process of de-segregation has proceeded sufficiently far to enable the Superintendent to present his plan for the reorganization of his staff including such changed duties as he then finds expedient.

9. That a schedule be set up providing by September, 1954, for the establishment of new boundaries for all schools; the closing of the Military Road School; the relief of pupil-overcrowding in those elementary schools and junior high school listed in the schedule on pages 7 and 8; the beginning of the merging of the McKinley and Armstrong Technical High Schools; the opening of both Teachers Colleges on a de-segregated basis; and by September, 1955, the complete de-segregation of all schools in the system.

The Superintendent further recommends that he be authorized to prepare an estimate of funds to be sought through appropriation covering such expenses as will be incurred in the de-segregation process that can not be met from funds already appropriated.

Superintendent of Schools

The Superintendent made the following statement:

"I think there are probably two points that rise above all others as being points of misunderstanding or difference of opinion, and I would like to speak, if I may, to those two points quite briefly by way of further explanation.

The two points I have in mind are the choice to remain in the present school until completion of that level and the dates for the various steps to be taken for the completion of the de-segregation plan. Now with respect to the first of those two points, the plan proposed by the Superintendent would grant the option to all presently enrolled pupils to (1) remain in their present schools until completion of that level, whether that be elementary, junior high school or senior high school, or (2) to transfer to the school which under the new boundaries will serve areas in which they reside. Every student would be given that option.

It is important to bear in mind that this choice obtains only until a child finishes the school in which he is presently enrolled and that every pupil new to a school by reason of promotion, change of residence, or transfer from another school must attend the school serving his residence area.

It is the firm belief of the Superintendent that this plan is educationally sound, that it is essential to the educational development of children, and that it will result in a minimum of disruption to the entire school system and to this community.

The advocacy of this plan is based upon the following considerations:

1. The option to remain in present schools until graduation will apply to pupils now in both Division 1 and Division 2 schools.

2. These same children will have equal opportunity to transfer to the schools that will serve their places of residence under newly established boundaries. Indeed all pupils entitled to such transfers will have priority over any children previously attending the school but living outside the new boundaries.

3. Therefore, any pupil who wishes to attend the school serving his residence area under the new boundaries may do so.

4. By this plan through the exercise of the options there is positive assurance that in all schools serving areas with mixed population there will be at the outset an admixture of the races.

5. Since every child has the right to attend the school in his home area if he chooses, it is difficult to find convincing arguments for arbitrarily transferring any child who may wish to remain in the school previously attended and who can be accommodated there.

6. The transition to an integrated school system should be accomplished with a minimum of disruption to the educational program of children.

7. Transfer of children from one school to another can have the following effects:

   A. Interruption of the continuity of instruction.

   B. The replacement of well established relationships with teachers and pupils by new associations.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

C. The loss to the pupil of the teacher who knows him as a person and who is acquainted with his educational background and needs.

D. Loss or at least interruption of the advantages of prestige and leadership which he has established.

E. Since in the secondary schools the course offerings are not identical, but are determined in large part by the requirements and demands of students, the Superintendent feels the need of the interim period to make sure that after all transfers are settled as few students as possible will be interrupted in their present planned curriculums, since courses can be organized with teacher transfers where necessary to obviate this kind of difficulty.

8. Transfer of all students initially would require a great many more moves of teachers and resulting reorganization of school staffs and school offerings than are necessary to accomplish the de-segregation process.

In considering this proposal of the Superintendent a controlling consideration should be the fact that the purpose of public education everywhere is the welfare and progress of the child. The Superintendent feels that unnecessary transfers to accomplish a desired goal immediately and to satisfy adult desires would be a blow to the welfare and progress of the child for whom the schools exist.

The second point to which I'd like to give further explanation has to do with the timing of the various steps to complete integration.

A point of view has been expressed that all children should be assigned to schools according to the newly established boundaries by September, 1954. For the following reasons the Superintendent believes that only the significant emergency transfers recommended should be made as of September, 1954.

1. Using the spot maps for all schools that have been prepared at the Superintendent's direction and the I.B.M. cards, representing 103,000 students, the drawing of new boundary lines can be completed earlier than September as originally estimated.

2. The assignment of pupils to schools according to the new boundaries, however, is not accomplished by indicating these boundaries on a map. The satisfactory accomplishment of this complicated process of transferring large numbers of children and preparing the schools to receive them involves the following steps:

   A. The actual drawing of new boundary lines for every school.

   B. The announcement of these new boundaries to the patrons of the schools together with the furnishing of sufficient explanatory material to enable them to understand how the new boundaries will operate.

   C. The securing of school choices signed by the parent of every child who is entitled to any option.

   D. The compilation of these choices to determine the total number of pupils to be accommodated in each school according to the new boundaries.

   E. The further readjustment where possible of boundary lines for any school which at this stage appears to be overpopulated.

   F. The listing by the building principals of all pupils to be transferred together with the preparation of the usual necessary transfer data including in the secondary schools the preparation of an individual transcript of record for each pupil.

   G. Notification to all parents whose children are to be transferred.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

H. The necessary reorganization of classes according to grade or subject matter following the adjustment in individual school enrollments.

I. The necessary changes in teacher assignments following the completion of pupil assignments.

J. The necessary building changes and moves where rooms now used for office purposes will be required for classes.

K. The moving of teacher and pupil furniture to accommodate the changed building enrollments.

L. The reallocation and transfer of equipment, textbooks, and classroom supplies.

All of these steps are essential to a smooth and efficient transition.

3. These steps can not be accomplished in the summer when the schools are not in session and pupils, teachers, parents and field officers are not available. Even though it is possible to require educational employees to serve during the vacation period any move in this direction would result in lowered morale at a time when it should be at its highest point. Furthermore, there would still be no means of communicating with pupils and parents.

4. It is highly important that the moving of so many children and teachers and the complete changeover on so vast a scale should be undertaken only after detailed planning and conferences.

5. It is the opinion of the Superintendent that the complete transition of the school system in a sound orderly way by September 1954 is administratively impossible.

The Superintendent in his May 25 report recommended that the transition be completed by September, 1955. It was explained that complete de-segregation would be accomplished step-by-step during the school year beginning in September 1954. The first steps recommended for September involved the transfer of approximately 2700 children from 21 present Division 2 schools to 18 Division 1 schools to relieve serious over-crowding in the colored elementary and junior high schools. It also recommended the opening of the teachers colleges to both races and the merging of Armstrong and McKinley High Schools. The report did not detail the progressive steps which can be undertaken during the school year 1954-55. The steps which seem possible in present planning are:

1. Completion of boundaries by July 1, 1954.
2. Additional transfers as soon after the opening of the school year as possible by the application of the new boundaries in certain areas in which the number of pupils to be transferred is very limited.
3. The completion of de-segregation of the senior and vocational high schools by February 1, 1955.
4. Such other transfers as may be found possible and desirable when the actual fall enrollments are available.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that that is about all I care to say other than to remind you that this plan was worked out by the staff with the Superintendent in a series of many meetings which were held, some of them night meetings, long sessions and have been given very careful consideration. It is our opinion that the slight amount of delay which is involved in this problem is essential for the orderly working out of this very complicated program. Furthermore, the slight delay recommended is not serious when we consider that the steps taken by us toward de-segregation in September and those which may be taken during the next school-year before the final decree of the

BLURRED COPY

Supreme Court is handed down are actually in advance of legal necessity.

Emphasis should be placed, therefore, it seems to me, not upon any incompleteness of the process in September, but upon the fact that changes made by that time are in advance of any final directive from the Supreme Court.

The Superintendent and his staff will be held responsible for the successful administration of plans for de-segregation. They should not, therefore, be required to follow a schedule which in their judgment cannot be met by orderly and well thought-out educational procedures. The sincere, honest, and objective opinion of the staff as to the time required and the methods to be used should be given consideration. I believe that that is all." STEPS IN DE-SEGREGATION PROGRAM TO BE ACCOMPLISHED

July 1	Superintendent to submit to Board maps and descriptive data to show new boundary lines for all elementary junior high and senior high schools.
	All necessary data concerning new boundaries to be furnished school principals and press to insure publicity reaching all school personnel and patrons.
July 1	Superintendent to submit recommendations for merging of all lists of persons eligible for appointment to all teacherships on all levels.
July 6	Completion of estimate for 1956 budget for funds needed to convert McKinley High School to a modern technical school to permit the eventual closing of the present Armstrong Technical High School.
September 1*	Use of new boundaries on all levels for all pupils new to the public schools including kindergarten and first grade pupils entering the public schools for the first time.
September 13*	Evening schools to open for operation on an integrated basis.
September 13*	Transfers of selected Division 2 elementary school pupils who, because of present boundaries, are required to travel excessive distances where there are present Division 1 schools near their homes. This is possible as it involves a limited number of pupils and in no instance will require reorganization in a school receiving pupils or the transfer of furniture or equipment.
	Any similar cases on the secondary level will be considered on an individual basis.

* This step has not previously been reported to the Board.

 This number does not include the schools which are integrated by the admission of pupils new to the school system and the new kindergarten and first grade pupils.

Hold meetings for parents of all children who are qualified to request options to explain the choices although no assurance can at that time be given whether the options can be approved for February 1 or for a later date.

Written statements to be filed not later than November 11 confirming all options requested. Sixth, ninth and twelfth grade pupils not to be transferred.

The Superintendent repeats his desire to take such additional progressive steps as are consistent with the welfare of the children. He will, therefore, examine and tabulate all the written options that are filed to determine the numbers of pupils residing outside the new boundaries who wish to remain in their present schools and the numbers of those who wish to transfer to the schools serving their residence areas. On the basis of these findings he will then make such changed pupil assignments as are found feasible without forced transfers at the beginning of the new semester in February.*

January 31 1955*

Assign all junior high school graduates to senior high schools on the basis of the new boundaries.

Make such additional teacher transfers and school reorganizations as are necessary.

Effect such transfers at all levels as may produce a better balanced use of all school facilities, and at the same time be consistent with the educational program of the children themselves.

Arrange for building changes and transfers of equipment and supplies as are necessitated by the changed pupil assignments.

February to June 1955

Complete the processing of all options not acted upon for February with the consequent pupil transfer and reassignment of teachers on September 1, 1955.

Arrange for additional transfers of furniture and equipment and textbooks and supplies, where necessary.

September 1, 1955*	The Superintendent announces one further important step in the integration process which is now presented. This will involve the closing of the Cardozo High School by June, 1955, and the merging of the Wilson and Miner Teachers Colleges in the present Cardozo building in September, 1955. The rezoning of the senior high schools has revealed such an overage of seating space that Cardozo can be closed and the pupils accommodated in the remaining senior high schools, freeing the Cardozo building for college use. It is planned also at the same time to open a junior high school unit in the same building to serve as a laboratory school for the new merged college. The Superintendent will submit a subsequent and more detailed report on this new plan. As the Superintendent studies the entire process of integration and discovers additional steps which can be taken he will advise the Board of Education.
September 1, 1955	All steps will have been taken to complete desegregation of the public schools. Technically, desegregation will have begun in all schools in September, 1954, since the admission of all pupils including kindergarten and first-grade pupils new to the public schools will be on the basis of the new boundaries. All senior high schools will, in addition, be further integrated by the admission of all junior high school graduates in February, 1955, on the basis of the new boundaries.

The Superintendent recommends that the Board of Education approve this schedule and authorize the Superintendent to proceed administratively to carry out the various steps enumerated.

Respectfully submitted,

H. M. Corning
Hobart M. Corning
Superintendent of Schools.

The Superintendent submitted the following report:

"September 22, 1954

"To the Board of Education
of the District of Columbia

"Ladies and Gentlemen:

"Because of the important and far reaching changes that have accompanied the opening of the public schools, I am presenting this summary of the happenings thus far in September.

"By September 10, the first working day for teachers, the staff officers had completed their work of reorganization of schools in accordance with the steps in the desegregation program presented to the Board in June. Eligible registers of applicants for teacherships had been merged and appointments had been made to fill vacancies from these merged lists. Other teachers had been transferred to meet changed school populations. Many pupils—in addition to those promoted from the elementary to the junior high schools and from the Junior high schools to the senior high schools—had been transferred to new schools according to the plans formulated in the late spring. Furniture had been moved to meet changes in building use and supplies, equipment, and textbooks had been readied for a new and different opening school day.

"At the first teachers meetings in more than one-fifth of the building for the first time colored and white teachers were side by side as they participated in the final plans for the return of their pupils on the following Monday. In the afternoon elementary school personnel gathered before the television screens in their respective buildings to receive my direct greetings.

"There was admittedly tension across the city on the opening day. Much careful preparatory work has been done—not only in the way of checking and oiling the machinery of school administration—but more deeply and of far greater importance in increased understanding and sympathetic acceptance of the many variations in cultural relationships. Some of this had been accomplished by city-wide, official workshop sessions and some by the participation of hundreds of school employees on a wholly voluntary basis in meetings, discussions and study in order to be better prepared to meet changes such as now were set into action by the pronouncement of the Supreme Court in May, 1954, on the subject of segregation in the public schools of the United States.

"We no longer ring bells to summon our pupils to school. On Monday, September 13, without signal and beginning long before nine o'clock, children left their homes for school—about 97,000 of them, many to go to buildings near their homes which they had not hitherto even entered. To help in this day of transition police officers were available near every school building in the city to watch traffic conditions, to assist at street crossings, and in general to cooperate in the beginning of a new kind of school system.

"I had heard some rumors of the possibility of friction on this opening day, but as the morning passed I received no appeals for assistance, no word of difficulties, but on the contrary reports of an amazingly successful opening in which parents, children, and teachers outdid themselves in a determined cooperative effort that resulted in a very satisfying record. Children were excused at 12:15 this first day in order that teachers and school officers might have the remaining hours to complete the jobs that were still to be done before the first full day of the study, work and plan that is provided for our pupils program.

"The opening day of school is always almost wholly out of the hands of the central school officers and the full responsibility for the activities that day lies in the field. I can, therefore, unreservedly commend to the Board all the teachers and officers in the field because of their performance on that Monday and during the days that have followed which have been wholly free from untoward incidents. Building visits have been made to many schools during these days and the reports are the same—fine spirit, pleasant relationships, and a buzz of coordinated activities that spell a good school in full operation.

"There have been some unhappy and some disappointed individuals. There have been a number of parents who have sought transfers for their children because of the effect which the changes have made in their own families. In some instances it has been possible to meet their requests, in others not.

"Early in the summer I began to receive letters requesting consideration in the placement of pupils in September. Some of the problems presented were caused by the new boundaries, some by the fact that pupils new to the system were required to enter the school serving the areas of their residence while their brothers and sisters were attending another school; thus dividing the family, some because of physical conditions which necessitated special consideration. The long distances which some pupils were required to travel caused parents to ask for transfers without waiting for the options provided for in the Superintendent's plan.

"I therefore appointed a committee of eight school officers to review these cases and to come to a decision in each one. This committee consisted of two senior high principals, two junior high principals and two directors of elementary education and the Executive Assistant to the Superintendent and the Administrative Assistant to one of the First Assistant Superintendents.

"The work of this committee has not been completed, although, of the almost 500 letters already processed it has been possible to make favorable adjustment for approximately 60 per cent. Some of these requests were at first denied but because of changed circumstances and administrative action it was possible later to give favorable action. About 10 per cent of the cases have been rejected, and the remaining 30 per cent are dependent on the options plan. Replies to parents giving the committee decisions were delayed because of the great number of interviews and telephone calls which had to be handled by the co-chairmen.

"There are approximately 200 additional cases before the committee for review. Many of these, however, will be taken care of by the options which have been called for in the elementary and senior high schools and which will be called for in the junior high schools on September 23. The greatest single problem presented in these letters is that of the divided family. Parents will now be able to exercise their options to have their children transferred to the school serving their area and in this way, if they so desire, have their families together in the same school.

"As rapidly as possible any remaining cases which cannot be solved by the exercise of the options will be processed by special committee.

"Considerable reference has been made to changes in our schools this fall. For the purpose of record, these are the steps in the desegregation plan accomplished during these opening days:

> "New kindergarteners, new first graders, and all pupils attending Washington schools for the first time entered schools on the basis of the new boundaries.
>
> "More than 3000 elementary and junior high pupils transferred to schools in general nearer their homes to relieve overcrowded school centers.
>
> "About a hundred children travelling excessively long distances last year were permitted to transfer to much nearer schools.
>
> "At the Thomson and Walker-Jones schools classes were organized experimentally on a lower pupil-teacher ratio and special arrangements have been made to provide in these schools increased medical, nursing, and psychiatric service. These experiments have the sponsorship of the Commissioners' Youth Council.
> "In the former Military Road School, a center for not more than twenty mentally retarded children is being established in which the three special teachers provided in the 1955 Appropriations Act will work.

"The merging of the McKinley and Armstrong High Schools was begun with the transfer of several hundred children to McKinley.

"Both Miner and Wilson Teachers Colleges were opened to all qualified applicants.

"All evening schools were opened on an integrated basis.

"Since the opening of schools the calendar has been stepped up so far as the filing of 'options' applications is concerned:

"On the senior high school level about 460 such applications are now being processed.

"Applications for options on the elementary level have been called for and notices concerning such applications on the junior high school level will be issued on September 23.

"No guarantee can of course be made that all the applications will be approved.

"To enrollment of 97,000 on the opening day had increased to more than 103,000 on Friday, September 17.

"This report is for the information of the Board and I wish to express for myself and the officers our appreciation of the staunch support we have had from board members during this period. I think that the Board members will understand my pride in what has been done this fall and in the manner in which it has been accomplished. I repeat my admiration for the fine work that has been done by the school personnel and the understanding and cooperation of the community as a whole.

"Respectfully submitted,

Circular of the Superintendent of Schools of the District of Columbia

PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA
FRANKLIN ADMINISTRATION BUILDING
WASHINGTON 5, D. C.

Superintendent's Circular No. 79
March 9, 1954

To All School Officers:

At the meeting of the Board of Education held on December 16, 1953, the Superintendent advised the Board of Education that he planned to set up a series of meetings in the general field of intercultural relationships. The first meeting which was in the nature of a seminar was held on March 3, for members of the Superintendent's staff and members of the Board of Education. It was felt that since meetings of this sort are to be planned throughout the school system it would be well to start with a pilot meeting for chief administrative officers and board members. Since additional meetings are to be called it is desirable that field officers and teachers know the general nature of the meeting which was held on March 3.

To assist in this meeting three experts in the field were brought to Washington:

Dr. John L. Milligan, Assistant Commissioner of Education in charge of Intercultural Affairs, Newark, New Jersey.

Dr. Dan W. Dodson, Professor of Education and Director of Curriculum and Research Center for Human Relations Study, New York University.

Mr. William E. Vickery, Education Director, National Conference of Christians and Jews.

The Superintendent opened the meeting by stating its general purpose which was "to create a climate for general understanding and improved relationships among the various segments of our population." The Superintendent stated that the seminar was not geared to any particular type of school organization but that there is need for better intercultural relationships whether the schools continue to be segregated or whether integration is ordered.

The Superintendent called attention to the comments of one civic leader who contended that too much emphasis has been placed upon the preparation of the white population. This leader contended that a four-way preparation is needed—a preparation of the colored population for right attitudes if integration is ordered and preparation against the disappointment if segregation is continued; on the other hand, the preparation of the white population for the adjustments which will be necessary if integration is ordered and preparation for the development of right attitudes if segregation is continued. It would seem that this analysis and advice are good and that better intercultural understandings and relationships are desirable and needed whatever the circumstances may be.

The Superintendent stated further that the seminar was not dealing "with segregation or integration as such or with the advantages and disadvantages of either system, but that we are dealing rather with the problem of developing desirable human understandings and relationships as we live together and work together for the education of all the children—no matter under what general plan the schools are organized."

The Superintendent stated that the workshop should be characterized by a down to earth consideration of the following topics:

1. Practical problems in the field of intercultural relationships now existing.
2. Practical problems in interracial relationships which may present themselves if schools are integrated.
3. Practical solutions of these problems.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

4. Procedures for breaking down prejudices and misunderstandings.

5. Methods of developing cooperative and harmonious effort among the patrons of the schools and all school personnel.

6. General nature of meetings to be held.

During the months of April and May a series of seminars is being set up which will make this sort of experience available to all officers in the field. This is done in the hope that field officers in turn will provide similar experiences for the teachers with whom they are associated. The exact dates of these subsequent seminars have not been set. Neither can announcement be made at this time of the leaders who will assist the groups. Complete announcement will be issued soon. A general meeting will be held for teachers also before the close of school.

Yours very sincerely,

HOBART M. CORNING

APPENDIX C

MINUTES OF THE SEVENTH (STATED) MEETING OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION 1952-53 DECEMBER 17, 1952

[p A-30f] Mr. Tobriner stated he wishes to present a matter of new business to the Board at this time. He stated it is known by everyone that cases involving segregation in school systems have been argued before the Supreme Court of the United States and among those cases is the case of Bolling against Sharpe which involves the constitutionality of the present segregated system in the District of Columbia. Accordingly, Mr. Tobriner continued, there is a possibility that the Court at some time in the future, near or far, will hand down a ruling which may possibly involve the end of segregation in the District of Columbia. Mr. Tobriner stated he is advised that the Superintendent of Schools is in the process of making plans for that possibility. Mr. Tobriner stated further he feels the Board of Education would be highly derelict in its duty if it did not take into account that possibility and make preparations for that eventuality. Mr. Tobriner thereupon made a motion that the Board at its next stated meeting or adjournment thereof, through its President and its Superintendent, request to appear before it leading citizens of this community, officials of the District of Columbia, members of the clergy and group representatives to give the Board the benefit of their views on two subjects: (1) the question of the mechanics of integration, if it should be ordered, and, (2) what educational preparation might be deemed necessary in order to make integration, if it is ordered, work more freely. The motion was seconded by Colonel Hamilton.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Mrs. Phillips stated that the mechanics of this matter might be contained in the decision of the Court with which Mr. Tobriner agreed.

As a suggestion from the Chair, Acting President Steinem stated it was his personal feeling, inasmuch as the Board of Education has been represented by counsel, that before the Board goes on record adopting or rejecting the pending motion, it should consult with the Corporation Counsel, D. C. who represented the case of the District of Columbia before the Supreme Court, to ascertain whether any action of the Board, might, in any way, be prejudicial to the presentation of his case.

In support of the pending motion as he said he understood it, Colonel Hamilton stated the motion has nothing to do with the ultimate action of the Court and the Board is not trying to influence the Court one way or the other. Colonel Hamilton stated further that Mr. Tobriner by his motion is suggesting that the members of the Board give this matter some thought and seek advice from cross sections of the community.

Mr. Faulkner stated he felt Mr. Tobriner's motion would be a good one if and when the Court should decide that segregation is illegal. He stated that he also felt Mr. Tobriner's motion was therefore premature at this time and that he would oppose it on that ground.

The Superintendent stated he had two observations to make. First, he said, as he understands Mr. Tobriner's motion, the purpose of the meeting would not be to argue whether or not the public schools should be segregated or integrated and, therefore, that issue would be left entirely out of the meeting. The purpose of the meeting would be to get the advice of organized citizenry in the community on how the public school system could operate best if the Supreme Court decides that the public schools are to be integrated. p A.33. The Superintendent stated that as he further understands the motion, the testimony to be given at such a meeting would, of course, be wholly advisory on the part of those who appear and the Board of Education "would not necessarily follow any of the suggestions indeed (sic) that are brought in." The Superintendent stated that as a matter of fact it is very important at some time or other to get community reactions on the two points which Mr. Tobriner has included in his motion and the only misgiving that he has about the meeting is as to its immediacy—the next Board meeting—together with whether or not in the judgment (sic) of the Corporation Counsel the meeting might be something which would prejudice the opinion of the Court one way or the other. The Superintendent said that is a point about which the lawyers could better give advice. As to the question . . .

Colonel Hamilton suggested that a special evening meeting be held by the Board as the Board does hold evening meetings with citizens on budget requests because he could not conceive of there being enough time for this matter at an afternoon Board meeting if the Board is to transact its other business also.

Mr. Tobriner thereupon amended his pending motion to provide that the meeting be held either at a regular or adjourned meeting of the Board or at such special meeting as the President desires to call. This amendment was accepted by Colonel Hamilton, the seconder of the motion.

The Superintendent asked if the Board wished the calling of such a meeting by the President of the Board to be dependent upon the advice of the Corporation Counsel. Mr. Tobriner replied that he did not believe the Corporation Counsel's advice was at all material on this matter, that the matter is with the Court and the Supreme Court is not going to be prejudiced by what the Board does or does not do after the case has been submitted.

[p A-34] The motion as amended was put and carried with Colonel Hamilton, Miss Parker, Mrs. Williams, Mr. Williams and Mr. Tobriner voting in the affirmative and Mrs. Phillips and Mr. Faulkner voting in opposition to the motion.

MINUTES OF THE EIGHTH (STATED) MEETING OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION 1952-53 JANUARY 21, 1953

[p A-36ff]

The Superintendent submitted the following report which he read:

"January 21, 1953

"To the Board of Education of the District of Columbia

"Ladies and Gentlemen:

"At the meeting of the Board of Education held on December 17, 1952, the following motion was passed by vote of the Board:

> "That at a regular or adjourned meeting of the Board or at such special meeting as the President desires to call, the Board, through its President and its Superintendent, request to appear before its leading citizens of this community, officials of the District of Columbia, members of the clergy and group representatives, to give the Board the benefit of their advice on two suggestions (sic) (1) the question of the mechanics of integration if it should be ordered and (2) what educational preparation might be deemed necessary in order to make integration, if it is ordered, work more freely.

"In the discussion of this motion, it was clearly set forth that the purpose of the meeting is not to permit arguments as to whether the schools should be segregated or integrated and that the advice of community organizations would be sought at this meeting only on the two questions set forth in the motion.

"As a result of discussions which have been held by the Superintendent and his staff on this subject, the officers and the Superintendent are unanimously of this opinion that this meeting when called would be more helpful to the Board of Education and the discussion by citizen groups would be more meaningful if opportunity would first be given to any organization or individuals in the community to submit in writing to the Superintendent of Schools their advice on the two questions contained in the motion.

[p A-37] The Superintendent would tabulate the views that are expressed in such statement and report to the Board of Education a summary which would be a general pattern of the thinking of the community on these two important questions. This summary would then be used by the individuals and groups who may be invited to appear before the Board of Education in accordance with the Board actions above referred to. The community reactions to this problem is of course important. At the same time the Superintendent presents the summary of community opinion or shortly thereafter, he will present to the Board of Education the result of his own study, with the officers of the administrative procedures which would be involved.

"This suggestion and recommendations are given not to supersede or circumvent the action of the Board in authorizing the calling of a meeting, but rather as a preliminary step in order to assure that the meeting, when called will be of more specific help than would otherwise be possible.

"The Superintendent recommends, therefore, that the Board of Education approve this as a preliminary step and authorize the public announcement that any interested organization or individual in the community is invited to submit its suggestion in writing, that the advice and suggestions should be confined to the two questions proposed in the Board actions and that the written statements be submitted to the Superintendent of Schools on or before February 4, 1953."

[p A-38] There was a feeling on the part of some of the members that the deadline of February 4, would be too short a time. Mr. Tobriner suggested that the deadline could be extended if necessary.

MINUTES OF THE ELEVENTH (STATED) MEETING OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION 1952-53 APRIL 15, 1953

[p A-13f] The Superintendent submitted the following report:

"April 15, 1953

"To the Board of Education of the District of Columbia

"Ladies and Gentlemen:

"At the meeting of the Board of Education held on January 21, 1953, the Board on recommendation of the Superintendent, authorized a public announcement to be made that any interested organizations or individuals submit suggestions in writing on (1) the question of the mechanics of integration if it should be ordered, and, (2) what educational preparation might be deemed necessary in order to make integration, if it is ordered, work more freely.

"In his report to the Board on January 21, 1953, the Superintendent indicated that he would submit a summary of the statements submitted which would be a general pattern of the thinking of the community on these two important questions. Attached hereto is a summary of the suggestions received together with an alphabetical list of the organizations and individuals who submitted communications. This summary is submitted for the information of the Board in the belief that it may be helpful to the Board in evaluating public opinion as expressed in these written statements."

The Superintendent stated that copies of the summary had been placed in the books of the members for this meeting. Colonel Hamilton asked if the Superintendent has a recommendation to make at this time. The Superintendent replied he did not and that he was still working on the matter in a series of meetings. Mr. Williams asked if the analysis in the summary reflected the thinking of the Administration and the Superintendent replied that it did not. Mr. Williams asked when the Superintendent would present his recommendation. The Superintendent replied that he would probably report next month and that "if there is a decision earlier than the next month" he will be ready earlier than the next meeting to present a plan to the Board.

SPOTTSWOOD THOMAS BOLLING, ET AL.,
PETITIONERS,

v.

C. MELVIN SHARPE, ET AL., RESPONDENTS.

BRIEF FOR RESPONDENTS

A final judgment of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia dismissing a complaint for injunction and declaratory judgment is here for review, by writ of certiorari, before judgment by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. The petitioners, plaintiffs in the District Court, sought admission to the Sousa Junior High School, a junior high school in Division 1 of the public school system of the District of Columbia, which division encompasses the several schools for white pupils, contending that the separation of white and Negro children in the public schools violates Article I, Sec. 9, Clause 3 of the Constitution of the United States, the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, Title 8, Sections 41 and 43 of the United States Code, and Chapter I, Article 1, Section 3 and Chapter IX, Articles 55 and 56 of the Charter of the United Nations.

OPINION BELOW

GROUNDS OF JURISDICTION

After a final order of dismissal of the complaint was entered by the United States District Court for the District of Columbia on April 9, 1951 (R. 19), notice of appeal to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit was filed by petitioners, plaintiffs in the District Court, on April 10, 1951 (R. 20). After briefs were filed in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit by both the petitioners and respondents, but before argument was had in that court, this Court, in a Per Curiam opinion dated October 8, 1952 entered jointly in the cases of Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, Briggs v. Elliott, and Davis v. County School Board of Prince Edward County, Virginia, Nos. 8, 101 and 191 respectively, October Term, 1952, continued said three cases for argument so that a petition for certiorari might be filed herein under the provisions of 28 U. S. C. § § 1254(1), and 2101(e). A petition for writ of certiorari was filed herein by petitioners on October 24, 1952 seeking review of the judgment of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, which petition was granted on November 10, 1952. Jurisdiction of this Court is accordingly predicated upon the provisions of Title 28, United States Code, Sections 1254(1) and 2101(e).

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

In the opinion of the respondents the questions presented herein are:

(1) Whether the complaint filed by petitioners in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia states a claim on which relief can be granted.

(2) Whether Acts of Congress providing for the establishment and maintenance of a dual school system in the District of Columbia are constitutional.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The statement of the case incorporated in the brief filed by petitioners sets forth as facts most of the allegations of their complaint filed in the District Court rather than stating them merely as allegations. There are also a few statements which are in error and, accordingly, respondents believe that the following is a correct presentation of the facts:

A complaint filed in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia alleges in substance the following:

> The corporate petitioner, Consolidated Parent Group, Inc., is an organization having for its objective, among others, "abolition of segregation and other discriminatory practices now invoked upon minority groups in the public schools and recreational areas of the District of Columbia."
> The adult petitioners are taxpayers and citizens of the United States and of the District of Columbia, required by law to send their respective children, minor petitioners, to public schools in the District, and are subject to criminal prosecution for failure so to do. The minor petitioners are Negroes, are residents of the District of Columbia, are within the statutory age limits of eligibility to attend public schools of said District, and were, by the principal of Sousa Junior High School, on the 11th day of September, 1950, and during the time when the respondents were receiving students for enrollment and instruction in Sousa Junior High School, a public school in the District of Columbia, refused admission and excluded from enrollment and instruction therein solely because of their race or color.

Subsequently, minor petitioners appealed to the Associate Superintendent of Schools in charge of white vocational and junior high schools in the District of Columbia, to the First Assistant Superintendent of Schools, Divisions 1-9 (now Division 1), restricted to white pupils, to the Superintendent of all public schools in the District of Columbia, and to the Board of Education. The several school officials refused admission and excluded the minor petitioners from enrollment and instruction in Sousa Junior High School, solely because of their race and color, and the Board of Education upheld the action of these school officers.

Defendants in the action filed in the District Court, who are now the respondents, are members of the Board of Education, the several school officers heretofore mentioned, and the First Assistant Superintendent of Schools, Division 10-13 (now Division 2), restricted to colored pupils.

The minor and adult petitioners, allegedly on their own behalf and on behalf of others similarly situated, together with the corporate petitioner, also allegedly acting on behalf of itself and all Negro citizens of the United States residing in the District of Columbia, "similarly situated", on November 9, 1950 filed the complaint (R. 1-14), in the District Court, against the respondents in their respective official capacities. The suit sought a declaratory judgment that the respondents are without right to construe certain Acts of Congress so as to exclude the minor petitioners from Sousa Junior High School on account of their race or color, and sought interlocutory and permanent injunctions restraining the respondents from so excluding the minor petitioners and requiring them to admit the minor petitioners to said school. The complaint is based upon alleged violation of Article 1, Section 9, Clause 3 of the Constitution, the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution, Sections 41 and 43 of Title 8 of the United States Code, and Chapter I, Article 1, Section 3 and Chapter IX, Articles 55 and 56 of the Charter of the United Nations.

The complaint alleges that the minor petitioners "do now attend a junior high school in said District."

Contrary to the allegation in paragraph 4 of the complaint (R. 4), the compulsory school attendance law of the District of Columbia, 43 Stat. 806 (set out in Appendix B of petitioners' brief), does not require attendance upon a public school.

Subsequently, the respondents, through counsel, filed a motion to dismiss the complaint (R. 18).

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Petitioners brought this action in the district court to require respondents, members of the Board of Education and school officials, to admit Negro children to Sousa Junior High School, a school established and maintained for white children. The complaint charges that the minor petitioners are deprived of "enjoyment of the educational opportunities afforded" in Sousa Junior High School in violation of the Civil Rights Act, the United Nations Charter, Article I, Section 9, Clause 3 of the Constitution, and the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. The complaint admits, however, that the minor petitioners "do now attend a junior high school" in the District and contains no allegation that any educational opportunity available in Sousa Junior High School is not available in the junior high school which minor petitioners "do now attend." These fatal deficiencies of the complaint not only justified the district judge in dismissing the complaint but required that he do so.

A series of Congressional enactments between 1862 and 1866 providing for the establishment of a dual school system in the District of Columbia were reenacted by Congress in 1874 as part of the Revised Statutes of the District. This Court construed these enactments as requiring the maintenance of the dual school system by so referring to them in the case of Plessy v. Ferguson, in 1896.

The highest court of the District of Columbia has on two occasions, in 1910 and in 1950, construed the Revised Statutes of the District as requiring the maintenance separate schools for white and colored children. Indeed, Congress itself in a number of enactments for the District of Columbia between 1874 and 1951 has treated and dealt with the dual school system as an established fact. Since this Court ordinarily accepts the construction and interpretation by the highest court of the District of Columbia of purely local laws, that court's construction and interpretation of these purely local laws should be accepted herein.

Even slavery was constitutional under the Fifth Amendment—it required a constitutional amendment to end it. When slavery in the District of Columbia was abolished by Congress before the adoption of the Thirteenth Amendment, "due process" commanded payment for the property thus taken. Separate schools for white and colored children were set up by the very same legislators who proposed the Fourteenth Amendment and who enacted the Civil Rights Acts. Thus their contemporaneous judgment was that a dual system of schools is constitutional. During the years following the Civil War, when political rights for Negro citizens were being established by constitutional amendments and legislation, an integrated school system for the District was not considered by the Congress to be an essential part of the rights. Indeed, after the dual system had been in operation for over a quarter century, some of the outstanding Negro spokesmen of the community insisted that the continuance thereof is essential to the maximum development of the race.

Dual school systems have been many times decided by this Court to be constitutionally valid under the Fourteenth Amendment, which contains an "equal protection" clause as well as a "due process" clause. In view of these decisions and the oft-enunciated rule that the due process clauses of the two Amendments are similarly construed, the dual system in the District of Columbia cannot be violative of the Fifth Amendment.

Beyond the fact that there was such a close tie between the Fourteenth Amendment, the Civil Rights Acts and the laws setting up the dual school system in the District, efforts to specifically include integration of District schools in an amendment of the Civil Rights Act failed of passage in Congress and, indeed, the enactment of the Revised Statutes in 1874 repealed by implication any concept that the earlier Civil Rights Act denounced the dual school system.

The provisions of the United Nations Charter do not constitute the equivalent of valid congressional enactments nor do such Charter provisions have the effect of repealing by implication federal, State or municipal laws in conflict therewith. The "human rights" and "fundamental freedoms" mentioned in Article 1 and Article 55 of the Charter are not defined anywhere therein, but are no greater than the rights and freedoms guaranteed to Americans by the federal Constitution. These Articles, as well as Article 56, are non-self-executing rather than self-executing provisions and must be implemented by legislation to override established local law.

Since the laws establishing separate schools for white and Negro children in the District of Columbia had for their purpose the giving rather than the denial of educational opportunity, it connot be said that such laws constitute a legislative pronouncement of guilt and punishment of the Negro people without trial. These laws are not, therefore, Bills of Attainder, and certainly the construction thereof so as to require the maintenance of the dual school system cannot be considered violative of the constitutional prohibition against Bills of Attainder.

The duty of the courts is to interpret, not to enact, legislation. The policy or wisdom of the maintenance of a dual school system is beyond the power of courts to even consider. One branch of government should not encroach upon the domain of another and statutes should not be adjudged invalid except for manifest necessity. Since the two parts of the dual school system are conceded to be equal, if the long established policy of their maintenance in the District of Columbia is to be struck down, the Congress and not the Court is the body to make that decision.

ARGUMENT

I

The Complaint Filed Below States No Cause of Action Because, Inter Alia, it Fails to Set Forth Any Injuries To the Petitioners.

The complaint filed by the petitioners in the District Court (R. 1-14) in the name of five minors and their parents, all Negro residents of the District of Columbia, and a corporation known as Consolidated Parent Group, Inc., allegedly on behalf of the named plaintiffs and all other Negro citizens residing in the District of Columbia, and similarly situated, sought a declaratory judgment and temporary and permanent injunctive relief against the members of the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, the Superintendent of Schools, the two First Assistant Superintendents of Schools, an Associate Superintendent of Schools, and the Principal of the Sousa Junior High School. The complaint alleged that the exclusion of the minor plaintiffs from the Sousa Junior High School was solely because of their race and color, and that this exclusion violated Sections 41 and 43 of Title 8 of the United States Code, violated Article I, Section 9, Clause 3 of the Constitution of the United States, violated the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution, and violated Chapter I, Article 1, Section 3, and Chapter IX, Articles 55 and 56 of the Charter of the United Nations.

It is implicit in the complaint, and it is a conceded fact, that the Sousa Junior High School is a part of Division 1 of the local school system, the schools in which division are allocated for the instruction of white children. Although it is complained that the several violations enumerated above result from the failure to admit the minor petitioners to this particular school, it is alleged in paragraph 3 of the complaint that the minor petitioners "do now attend a junior high school in said District" (R. 4).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Erroneously, the complaint alleges that adult petitioners are required by law to send their children to public schools and are subject to prosecution for failure so to do. The law (43 Stat. 806, Secs. 31-201 and 31-207 D. C. Code, 1951), set out in petitioners' brief, Appendix B, requires only that adult petitioners shall cause their children to be instructed, publicly or privately, and does not require them to go to any school.

There is a total absence from the complaint of any allegation that the minor petitioners are not receiving in the junior high school in the District of Columbia which they now attend all of the educational opportunities afforded in the Sousa Junior High School. From this failure to negative enjoyment of educational opportunities, it may be assumed that the minor petitioners are, in fact, enjoying the same or equal educational opportunities as are afforded in the Sousa Junior High School. There is also a total failure to enumerate educational opportunities enjoyed at the Sousa Junior High School. Without specific allegations to the contrary it must be assumed that the minor petitioners who "do now attend a junior high school in said District" enjoy all of the educational opportunities afforded in any junior high school in the District of Columbia.

In Pacific States Box & Basket Co. v. White, 296 U. S. 176, this Court said:

> "When such legislative action 'is called in question, if any state of facts reasonably can be conceived that would sustain it, there is a presumption of the existence of that state of facts, and one who assails the classification must carry the burden of showing by a resort to common knowledge or other matters which may be judicially noticed, or to other legitimate proof, that the action is arbitrary.' Borden's Farm Products Co. v. Baldwin, 293 U. S. 194, 209. The burden is not sustained by making allegations which are merely the general conclusions of law or fact."

No directly comparable case has been found, but a closely analogous allegation to those made by the petitioners is the oft-used allegation of arbitrary and capricious action. In Wilkinson v. Hines, 64 App. D. C. 5, 73 F. 2d 514, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, said at page 8:

> "We are of the opinion also that the allegations in appellant's petition that the 'respondent acted arbitrarily and capriciously, without evidence to support his decision, and beyond the scope of his authority', are not averments of fact, but conclusions of law, and are not sustained by the other allegations of the petition."

Again in National War Labor Board v. Montgomery Ward & Co., 79 U. S. App. D. C. 200, 144 F. 2d 528, certiorari denied, 323 U. S. 774, this same court, speaking through Judge Edgerton, said:

> "Judicial interference with administration is sometimes necessary but always serious. * * * A plaintiff cannot confer jurisdiction to review even commonplace administrative action by a mere forecast that he will be irreparably injured if the court does not intervene. He must allege facts which support his forecast."

This Court in Silberschein v. United States, 266 U. S. 221, 225 used language particularly applicable to the case at bar, as follows:

> "The general allegations of the petition that the Director's decision was arbitrary, unjust and unlawful, and a usurpation of power, are merely legal conclusions. Clearly, the petition does not present a case where the facts are undisputed and the only conclusion properly to be drawn is one favorable to petitioner, or where the law was misconstrued, or where the action of the executive officer was arbitrary or capricious."

If it be argued that the liberality of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure has obviated the necessity for pleading facts to show arbitrariness or, as in this case, denial of educational opportunity, the answer may be found in Sheridan-Wyoming Coal Co., Inc. v. Krug, 83 U. S. App. D. C. 162, 168 F. 2d 557, where the court said:

> "The rules of Civil Procedure provide that a complaint shall contain 'a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief'. The Rule was intended to obviate the technicalities of pleading and, particularly, long and verbose allegations of evidentiary facts. With that objective we are in unqualified accord. However, a 'claim' cannot be stated in the form of a legal conclusion, without more. * * *. The minimum under the Rule is that the adversary party must be sufficiently advised to prepare his defense, and that the court must be sufficiently informed to determine the question presented. Defenses cannot be made to legal propositions in the abstract, nor do mere legal conclusions present questions upon which the court can pass. Justiciable cases and controversies arise upon facts." (Emphasis supplied.)

See, to the same effect, Marranzano v. Riggs National Bank, 87 U. S. App. D. C. 195, 184 F. 2d 349, 351.

In Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Authority, 297 U. S. 288, Mr. Justice Brandeis said at page 346:

> "The Court developed, for its own governance in the cases confessedly within its jurisdiction, a series of rules under which it has avoided passing upon a large part of all the constitutional questions pressed upon it for decision."

Justice Brandeis then listed seven items constituting the series of rules. The fifth, found at page 347, is as follows:

> "5. The Court will not pass upon the validity of a statute upon complaint of one who fails to show that he is injured by its operation."

To the same effect see Heald v. District of Columbia, 259 U. S. 114, 123; Corporation Commision v. Lowe, 281 U. S. 431, 438.

A. Acts of Congress Providing for Education of Children of the District of Columbia Require such Education in a Dual School System and have been so Construed by this Court.

B. Construction of Locally Applicable Laws by the Highest Court of the District of Columbia is Normally Accepted by this Court.

A.

Among the contentions of petitioners is one that the several Acts of Congress providing for the establishment and maintenance of schools in the District of Columbia do not require the maintenance of a dual system.

The enactments of Congress which in unambiguous terms specifically direct that separate schools be maintained for the education of white and colored children of the District of Columbia begin with the Act approved May 20, 1862. That Act and others on the same subject enacted prior to June 22, 1874 were carried into the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia, approved on that date.[1] Thus, although the requirement for separate schools was originally decreed by Congress at a time when the Negro was not a citizen, Congress reenacted that requirement six years after the adoption in 1868 of the 14th Amendment. So conclusively was the requirement stated that this Court, in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, 544-545, cited the pertinent sections of the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia as an illustration of laws requiring such separation.

In legislation enacted by Congress for the District of Columbia subsequent to the Revised Statutes, Congress dealt with the system of separate schools as an established fact. Thus, the Act approved June 6, 1900, 31 Stat. 564 (enacted by the 56th Congress, which also enacted the D. C. Code of 1901), established a paid Board of Education of seven members and provided for two assistant superintendents, "one of whom, under the direction of the superintendent, shall have charge of schools for colored children; * * ." The Act of June 20, 1906,[2] which established the present Board of Education, authorized the Board, upon recommendation of the Superintendent of Schools, to " * * appoint one white assistant superintendent for the white schools and one colored assistant superintendent for the colored schools * * *." In the District of Columbia Teachers' Salary Act of 1945 (59 Stat. 488), approved July 21, 1945, the provisions of the Act of 1906 with respect to assistant superintendents were repeated and extended in Title V, page 498, Section 12, and in addition, separate boards of examiners and separate chief examiners for the white and colored schools were provided for by Sections 13 and 14 of that Title. The District of Columbia Teachers' Salary Act of 1947,[3] approved July 7, 1947, contained almost identical provisions in Title V, Sections 11, 12 and 13. As late as the Act approved October 24, 1951, by which the District of Columbia Teachers' Salary Act of 1947 was amended, Congress in Section 8 thereof[4] provided for appointment by the Board of Education, on the recommendation of the Superintendent of Schools, of "a chief examiner for the board of examiners for white schools and a chief examiner for the board of examiners for colored schools."

B.

The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit has directly passed upon these Acts of Congress in three cases, Wall v. Oyster, 36 App. D. C. 50, Carr v. Corning and Browne v. Magdeburger, the latter two decided jointly, 86 U. S. App. D. C. 173, 182 F. 2d 14. Reference to the record and briefs in the case of Wall v. Oyster[5] shows that, contrary to the characterization of that case set out in petitioners' brief, the question of the requirement for a dual system of schools in the District was raised and the consitutional validity thereof was attacked. In paragraphs 8 and 9 of the amended petition (for writ of mandamus) filed May 7, 1910, it was alleged that Sections 281 to 285, 293 and 294 of the Revised Statutes of the United States Relating to the District of Columbia do not expressly, but only by implication, prohibit the attendance of colored children at white schools, and that insofar as said legislation attempts to exclude colored children from white schools it is unconstitutional and void because it violates the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution. True, the appellant's brief devotes but one sentence to this proposition, but the appellees, as members of the Board of Education, fully briefed the point and the opinion of the court specifically decided:

> "A statute enacted in 1864, and afterwards carried into the Revised Statutes of the District, > provided for the maintenance of separate free schools for white and 'colored' children, affording like facilities and advantages to each. D. C. Rev. Stat. secs. 281, 282, 306, 310, 314."

The court thereupon declared that the power of Congress, exercising all the functions of a state legislature in the District of Columbia, to provide for separation of white and colored children in the public schools has been effectually settled by this Court and cited Plessy v. Ferguson, supra.

In the Carr and Browne opinion Judge Prettyman for the Court of Appeals reviewed in extenso the history of the enactments by which separate schools were created and maintained in the District, and concluded, commencing on page 18, that the enactments cannot be read with any meaning except that the schools for white and colored children were then intended to be separate. The opinion then goes on to dispose of the contention that the provisions of the Revised Statutes have since been repealed and demonstrates that no subsequent enactment by the Congress can be so construed. Indeed, by pointing to a number of later Acts, the court demonstrates the continuing intention of Congress to maintain the dual school system in the District. Since these statutes are purely local in scope and confined in their operation to the District of Columbia, the oft-expressed rule of this Court that it will ordinarily accept the construction and interpretation thereof by the highest court of the District of Columbia should be applied. Del Vecchio v. Bowers, 296 U. S. 280, 285; D. C. v. Pace, 320 U. S. 698, 702. Cf. American Security and Trust Co. v. District of Columbia, 224 U. S. 491; United Surety Co. v. American Fruit Products Co., 238 U. III

The Dual School System in the District of Columbia is Not Violative of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

There is no doubt that Congress, under the provisions of Article I, Section 8 of the Constitution, has exclusive legislative authority over the District of Columbia. The nature, extent, and breadth of that power is nowhere better delineated and better documented than in the opinion of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia in Neild v. District of Columbia, 71 App. D. C. 306, 110 F. 2d 246. Therein it is pointed out that the power of Congress to legislate for the District of Columbia is not subject to the restrictions placed on State legislatures and is as extensive as is the power of Congress to legislate generally for the nation.

Acting under that broad authority this member of the Trinity which makes up the Government of the United States enacted laws providing for the establishment and maintenance of a dual school system in the District.[6] These enactments stem from the period before the Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments. At that time the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment was regarded as a bulwark for the protection of the property rights of the white and colored slave owners.[7]

When Congress undertook to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia,[8] it appropriated a million dollars to purchase from their owners the freedom of the approximately 3100 slaves in the District.[9]

For seventy-five or eighty years after the adoption of the Constitution and its first ten Amendments in 1789, civil and political rights for the Negro, while advocated by many, were not thought to be required by the Fifth Amendment. Indeed, slavery flourished thereunder. Not until the adoption of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments and the passage of the first Civil Rights Act did our forebears believe that there was legal foundation for the extension of any of the rights of citizenship to the colored man in this country. Even then, as will be pointed out hereinafter, his education in separate schools was not inveighed against by legislation. Quite the contrary was true.

At just about the time when the Fourteenth Amendment, containing, as it does, prohibitions upon the States against deprivation of life, liberty or property without due process of law and against denial to any person of the equal protection of the laws, was proposed in 1866, the same Congress which proposed it enacted some of the laws providing for separate schooling for the white and colored children in the District of Columbia. Judge Prettyman of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit thus commented thereon in his opinion for the court in the Carr and Browne Junior High cases, supra, 86 U. S. App. D. C. 173, 182 F. 2d 14, 18:

> "These various enactments by the Congress cannot be read with any meaning except that the schools for white and colored children were then intended to be separate. Moreover, it is significant, in respect to the constitutional points made here, that two of these statutes were enacted by the same Congress which proposed the Fourteenth Amendment and at almost the same time as that proposal. The Amendment was proposed by the Congress on June 16, 1866, and these acts were dated July 23, 1866, and July 28, 1866."

At page 16-17 in the Carr and Browne opinion, supra, the court said:

> "It is urged that the separation of the races is itself, apart from equality or inequality of treatment, forbidden by the Constitution. The question thus posed is whether the Consitution lifted this problem out of the hands of all legislatures and settled it. We do not think it did. Since the beginning of human history, no circumstance has given rise to more difficult and delicate problems than has the coexistence of different races in the same area. Centuries of bitter experience in all parts of the world have proved that the problem is insoluble by force of any sort. The same history shows that it is soluble by the patient processes of community experience. Such problems lie naturally in the field of legislation, a method susceptible of experimentation, of development, of adjustment to the current necessities in a variety of community circumstance. We do not believe that the makers of the first ten Amendments in 1789 or of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1866 meant to foreclose legislative treatment of the problem in this country."
>
> "The Supreme Court has consistently held that if there be an 'equality of the privileges which the laws give to the separated groups', the races may be separated. That is to say that constitutional invalidity does not arise from the mere fact of separation but may arise from an inequality of treatment. Other courts have long held to the same effect."

Cited for these propositions are a number of federal and State decisions and a number of cases in this Court, among which is Plessy v. Ferguson, supra, 163 U. S. 537. In the recent case of Adamson v. California, 332 U. S. 46, 53, the Court uses language which might well have been written to describe the decision of Plessy v. Ferguson, supra:

BLEED THROUGH

"It is the construction placed upon the amendment by justices whose own experience had given them contemporaneous knowledge of the purposes that led to the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment."

In their brief in the Court of Appeals in this cause counsel for petitioners laid great stress upon the Sweatt [10] and McLaurin [11] decisions of this Court. Here they have scarcely mentioned these two recent decisions dealing with education of colored youth. Undoubtedly they have come to the realization that both cases were decided solely on the proposition that the educational opportunities afforded to the respective Negro appellants therein were not equivalent or substantially equal to those furnished to white students. Indeed, some of the language used in the opinions by the Chief Justice actually supports the position of the respondents herein. In the Sweatt opinion, at page 635-636, the following is found:

"In Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337, 351 (1938), the Court, speaking through Chief Justice Hughes, declared that 'petitioner's right was a personal one. It was as an individual that he was entitled to the equal protection of the laws, and the State was bound to furnish him within its borders facilities for legal education substantially equal to those which the State there afforded for persons of the white race, whether or not other negroes sought the same opportunity.' • • •
In accordance with these cases, petitioner may claim his full constitutional right: legal education equivalent to that offered by the State to students of other races. Such education is not available to him in a separate law school as offered by the State. We cannot, therefore, agree with respondents that the doctrine of Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537 (1896), requires affirmance of the judg> ment below. Nor need we reach petitioner's contention that Plessy v. Ferguson should be reexamined in the light of contemporary knowledge respecting the purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment and the effects of racial segregation." (Emphasis supplied.)

Thus is there a reaffirmation of the long line of decisions of this Court sustaining the constitutional validity of the dual school system provided the facilities available to white and colored children are substantially equal.[12]

Decisions in McCabe v. Atchison T & SF Ry., Gong Lum v. Rice, and Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada,[13] were enunciated by jurists who were either at the time of the decision or were later to become Chief Justices of the United States.

In the McCabe case in 1914 Mr. Justice Hughes affirmed the correctness of the proposition:

> "* * * the question could no longer be considered an open one, that it was not an infraction of the Fourteenth Amendment for a state to require separate, but equal, accommodations for the two races."

In the Gong Lum case in 1924 Mr. Chief Justice Taft, for the Court, quoted from Cumming v. Richmond County Board of Education,[14] Plessy v. Ferguson, supra, and a number of federal and State decisions to arrive at the conclusion that separate schools for white and colored children are not in violation of the Constitution and that the requirement that a Chinese child should attend a colored school was constitutionally a question for each State to decide for itself.

And in Gaines v. Canada, supra, which was cited with approval in the later cases of Sipuel v. Board of Regents and Sweatt v. Painter, Mr. Chief Justice Hughes, in 1938, relying on the Plessy, McCabe and Gong Lum cases, said:

> "The State has sought to fulfill that obligation [providing advantages for higher education to Negroes] by furnishing equal facilities in separate schools, a method the validity of which has been sustained by our decisions." (Emphasis supplied.)

Mr. Justice Black and Mr. Justice Reed concurred in the opinion written by the Chief Justice in the Gaines case.

This case was decided scarcely fourteen years ago with only a single dissent by Mr. Justice McReynolds, who thought that equal facilities even outside the State were constitutional. What has changed the Constitution in the past fourteen years?

Considerable emphasis is placed by petitioners upon language used by this Court in Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U. S. 81, Korematsu v. United States, 323 U. S. 214, and Ex parte Endo, 323 U. S. 283. They also quote from the cases of Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U. S. 390, Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U. S. 510, Farrington v. Tokushige, 273 U. S. 284, and Oyama v. California, 332 U. S. 633. Examination of these and other cases cited by petitioners shows that they fall into three classes:

1. Cases in which there was a clear invasion of rights protected by specific provisions of the Civil Rights Acts;

2. Cases in which there were complete denials of rights or privileges secured by the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment or in one case, the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment; and

3. Cases in which confinement in concentration camps and other extreme restrictions were practiced upon Japanese citizens purely as war emergency measures.

Taking their cue from three cases involving citizens of Japanese descent who were completely denied every semblance of equality of treatment for security reasons during World War II (Hirabayashi v. United States, supra, Korematsu v. United States, supra, and Ex parte Endo, supra), petitioners assert that since there is no issue of national security present, in order to justify separate schools for white and colored pupils respondents are required to show that there is some more pressing public necessity which requires a dual school system in the District of Columbia. There are several answers to this proposition.

In the first place, petitioners are not deprived of anything as were the parties in the cases they have cited. Hirabayashi was subjected to a curfew regulation while his white brothers were not. Korematsu and Endo involved incarceration in concentration camps solely because of race. In Meyer v. Nebraska complete denial of the right to teach German to pupils was involved. Pierce v. Society of Sisters concerned the outlawing of parochial and private schools, and the Farrington case involved an attempt to put out of business foreign language schools in Hawaii. The complete denial of the right to own land was concerned in the Oyama case and freedom to engage in one's chosen occupation concerned the Court in Takahashi v. Fish and Game Commission, 334 U. S. 410, and Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356. In the case at bar the complaint recites in paragraph 3 thereof that the minor petitioners "do now attend a junior high school in said District" (R. 4), and on page 34 of their brief petitioners assert unequivocally "Here there is no question of equality of facilities."

Secondly, petitioners charge that separation in the public schools is "aimed at Negroes," that (as set forth in italics on page 21 of their brief) "* * * no legitimate educational purpose is served by the classification and distinction of pupils solely on the basis of race and color * * *," and that separation stamps them with a "badge of inferiority."

There can be no doubt that among a large segment of the people of the District of Columbia, which is almost 100 miles south of the Mason and Dixon line, there are attitudes which are antipathetical to the co-mingling of the races in schools or otherwise. Indeed, the Court can take judicial notice that racial tensions exist and racial clashes have occurred considerably further north in New York, Detroit, Chicago, and other communities in which there is no separation in schools. This being so, upon what basis do petitioners assume and assert that separate schools for white and colored pupils are maintained solely to stigmatize the colored children? Why do they quote from a brief filed in the Sweatt case (petitioners' brief 41): "the institution of segregation is designed to maintain the Negro race in a position of inferiority. It drastically retards his educational * * * development * * *"? The facts are otherwise. Even Gunnar Myrdal in his work "An American Dilemma," so often quoted by the opponents of separation, acknowledges in Chapter 41 thereof that some Negroes prefer the separate school even for the North. He quotes Dr. W. E. B. Du Bois, a prominent Negro educator and publisher and former officer of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, " * * * A mixed school with poor and unsympathetic teachers, with hostile opinion, and no teaching concerning black folk, is bad." It is not felt that the Court will be burdened by repeating here the quotation from Dr. Du Bois found at page 33-34 of appellees' brief in the companion case of Briggs v. Elliott (No. 101):

> "It is difficult to think of anything more important for the development of a people than proper training for their children; and yet I have repeatedly seen wise and loving colored parents take infinite pains to force their little children into schools where the white children, white teachers, and white parents despised and resented the dark child, made mock of it, neglected or bullied it, and literally rendered its life a living hell. Such parents want their child to 'fight' this thing out,—but, dear God, at what a cost! Sometimes, to be sure, the child triumphs and teaches the school community a lesson; but even in such cases, the cost may be high, and the child's whole life turned into an effort to win cheap applause at the expense of healthy individuality. In other cases, the result of the experiment may be complete ruin of character, gift, and ability and ingrained hatred of schools and men. For the kind of battle thus indicated, most children are under no circumstances suited. It is the refinement of cruelty to require it of them. Therefore, in evaluating the advantage and disadvantage of accepting race hatred as a brutal but real fact or of using a little child as a battering ram upon which its nastiness can be thrust, we must give greater value and greater emphasis to the rights of the child's own soul. We shall get a finer, better balance of spirit; an infinitely more capable and rounded personality by putting children in schools where they are wanted, and where they are happy and inspired, than in thrusting them into hells where they are ridiculed and hated." Does the Negro Need Separate Schools?, 4 J. of Negro Ed. 328, 330-31 (1935)."

History shows that such concerns as these expressed by Dr. Du Bois are quite probably the reason for the establishment and maintenance of the dual school system in the District. Certainly they were important considerations.

According to Dr. William S. Montgomery, a distinguished Negro educator,[15] appointed Assistant Superintendent in charge of colored schools in the District of Columbia September 1, 1900 and retired in 1924 after serving 47 years in the colored school system,

"It was natural at the beginning for the great majority of the teachers in colored schools to be > white, but in 1869 the instructors were half and half—as many colored as white—and as competent colored ones came forward they were given the preference in employment, not because of greater fitness from an intellectual or professional point of view, but on account of an element, mighty in its force and results, sympathy with and ability and willingness to enter into and appreciate the feelings and aspirations of the learner. * * * Of the early colored teachers words of eulogy fail; their monument is the system to-day." (Emphasis supplied.) [16]

The monument of which Dr. Montgomery wrote is the system of separate but equal schools for colored children which petitioners would destroy!

In the hearings preceding the passage of the Act of June 20, 1906,[17] the organic act of the present school system in the District, many distinguished Negro citizens and educators insisted on autonomy for the colored schools. Professor William A. Joiner of Howard University, chairman of a committee of colored leaders, after presenting to the House Committee a letter from his group, said, in part,[18]

> "I think, Mr. Chairman, that that embodies the main sentiment as expressed by that organization, an organization composed of those whose minds have led them into literary pursuits and those who have given attention to the best welfare and interest of their people. It may seem strange that this particular word 'colored' or the idea of colored schools thrusts itself into this argument. I would it where not so. Facts are stubborn things, and

Professor Lewis B. Moore, of Howard University, testifying before the Commitee said, in part:[19]

> "* * * Give us what is being asked for here by the colored citizens, give us that, and we shall conduct under the guidance of the board of education the colored schools of the District of Columbia in such a way as to produce just as good results as are produced anywhere else in this country."

Following this and other testimony of like import, the House Committee reported on the Act of 1906,[20] in part:

> "The bill does not change the number of assistant superintendents, merely enlarging the power of the colored superintendent so that he shall, besides having jurisdiction over the colored grade schools, also have entire jurisdiction over the colored normal, high, and manual-training schools. This was done at the earnest solicitation of the colored educators who appeared before the committee and was heartily indorsed by the superintendent of Howard University. The hearings developed that a great deal of friction had arisen between the director of high schools and the teachers in the colored high school, and to avoid this it was the unanimous opinion and desire of all who testified that not only should the colored superintendent have entire con-

The views expressed by these eminent Negro educators were accorded sympathetic and enlightened recognition by Congress in the enactment of the Act of 1906, and by every succeeding Congress which legislated on the subject until 1951.[21] Clearly the purpose of Congress was to serve the cause of the Negro in education rather than the contrary. The wisdom of the course pursued by Congress to achieve that purpose is not for the courts to decide. As was said in the License Tax Cases,[22] at page 469, "This court • • • cannot examine questions as expedient or inexpedient, as politic or impolitic. Considerations of that sort must, in general, be addressed to the legislature. Questions of policy determined there are concluded here." Hilton v. Sullivan, 334 U. S. 24, cited by petitioners, the Court, at page 34, alludes to the fact that public policy can be ascertained only by reference to statutes. In footnote 15 the Court cites United States v. Hutcheson, 312 U. S. 219, 235, and Johnson v. United States, 163 F. 30, 32. In the latter case, the court said:

> its will, however indirectly, that will should be recognized and obeyed."

When in 1910 the question of constitutional validity of separate schools was first presented to the District of Columbia Court of Appeals in Wall v. Oyster, 36 App. D. C. 50, and hardship or injustice was pleaded, Mr. Chief Justice Shepherd, for that court, said at page 58:

> "It has been urged that a cruel hardship will be inflicted upon the petitioner by the conclusion at which we have arrived. It may be, however, that greater evils would result from a different one. Be that as it may, our province is to interpret legislation, not to enact it." (Emphasis supplied.)

Judge Prettyman of that court in the recent case of Carr v. Corning, supra, said:

> "Such problems [the co-existence of different races in the same area] lie naturally in the field of legislation, a method susceptible of experimentation, of development, of adjustment to the current necessities in a variety of community circumstance." (Emphasis supplied.)

And Mr. Justice Frankfurter for this Court in Secretary of Agriculture v. Central Roig Refining Co., supra, said as late as February 6, 1950:

> "but the issue was thrashed out in Congress; Congress is the place for its reconsideration."

Finally, while this Court has tacitly approved the dual system of schools in the District of Columbia in but one case, Plessy v. Ferguson, supra, it has many times cited that case in support of its uniform holdings over many years that the Fourteenth Amendment, which applies only to the States and which contains an equal protection clause, does not prohibit the maintenance of dual school systems. It is settled that the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment does not apply to the District of Columbia, "* * * that Amendment being directed to the States. The Fifth Amendment, of course, does apply, but contains no equal protection clause."[23]

Mr. Chief Justice Stone in Detroit Bank v. United States, 317 U. S. 329, which cites, among others, Currin v. Wallace, 306 U. S. 1, and Steward Machine Co. v. Davis, 301 U. S. 548, said:

> "Unlike the Fourteenth Amendment, the Fifth contains no equal protection clause and it provides no guaranty against discriminatory legislation by Congress." (Emphasis supplied.)

Moreover, it is well established that the Fourteenth Amendment does not incorporate the provisions of the first eight Amendments, Louisiana ex rel Francis v. Resweber, 329 U. S. 459; Adamson v. California, 332 U. S. 46, Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U. S. 25. Conversely, it has been held that the general scope of the prohibitions of the Fifth Amendment as against the Federal Government is measured by the scope of the Fourteenth Amendment as against the states. "* * * the legal import of the phrase 'due process of law' is the same in both amendments." French v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co., 181 U. S. 324, 329. See also Twining v. New Jersey, 211 U. S. 78, 101. In Heiner v. Donnan, 285 U. S. 312, the court said at p. 326:

> "The restraint imposed upon legislation by the due process clauses of the two amendments is the same."

[23] Hamilton National Bank v. District of Columbia, 81 U. S. App. D. C. 200, 156 F. 2d. 843, 846.

In Hurd v. Hodge, supra, 334 U. S. 24, 35, the Court concluded its opinion by saying:

> "We are here concerned with action of federal courts of such a nature that if taken by the courts of a State would violate the prohibitory provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . It is not consistent with the public policy of the United States to permit federal courts in the Nation's capital to exercise general equitable powers to compel action denied the state courts where such state action has been held to be violative of the guaranty of the equal protection of the laws. We cannot presume that the public policy of the United States manifests a lesser concern for the protection of such basic rights against descriminatory action of federal courts than against such action taken by the courts of the States."

If the public policy of the United States prohibits action or limitation of action in the District of Columbia because it is prohibited in the States, public policy as pronounced in Acts of the Congress applying to the District of Columbia certainly ought to prevent the invalidation in the District of the purpose of those Acts unless there is an unequivocal finding that identical action by the several States is prohibited by the Constitution.

In fine, not only was integration in schools not required by the Fifth Amendment, but slavery was lawful thereunder. It required an Amendment of the Constitution to rid the country of that evil practice. The Fifth Amendment contains no "equal protection" clause and does not prohibit Congress from passing discriminatory laws so long as constitutional due process is preserved. Contemporary legislative history demonstrates that the Fourteenth Amendment, which does contain an "equal protection" clause, was not at the time of its proposal or adoption thought to be a bar to a dual school system in the District of Columbia. Numerous decisions of this and other courts over the years have sustained the view of the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment, of the Civil Rights Acts, and of the laws providing for the District's dual school system that the last are not in conflict with the first two. Since the Fourteenth Amendment contains a "due process" clause and decisions of this Court hold that the "due process" provisions of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments must be measured by the same standards, mere separation for educational purposes in schools, where facilities are substantially equal, cannot be struck down by the Court in the light of history and of prior decisions. If it be the will of the people that separate schools be abolished, then the people, and they alone, through their elected representatives or through constitutional convention, should express that will. The people of the United States through the legislative process have heretofore expressed themselves upon this most serious problem. The Court, if it follows its own precedents, should not presume to trespass upon the domain of another branch of government of equal dignity with it.

IV

The Dual School System of the District of Columbia Does not Violate the Civil Rights Acts.

In their complaint filed in the District Court petitioners allege that the refusal by respondents to admit the minor petitioners to Sousa Junior High School violates Sections 41 and 43 of Title 8 of the United States Code relating to civil rights. Section 41 of Title 8, U. S. C., according to Hurd v. Hodge, 334 U. S. 24, 30, Footnote 7, and to the Historical Note appearing thereunder in the United States Code Annotated, was revised from the Civil Rights Act of May 31, 1870, which was from the Civil Rights Act of April 9, 1866, and reads as follows:

> "All persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every State and Territory to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, give evidence, and to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, penalties, taxes, licenses, and exactions of every kind, and to no other."

Section 43 of Title 8 of U. S. C., which, according to the Historical Note appearing thereunder in the United States Code Annotated, is from the Act of April 20, 1871, reads as follows:

> "Every person who, under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage, of any State or Territory, subjects, or causes to be subjected, any citizen of the United States or other person within the jurisdiction thereof to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws, shall be liable to the party injured in an action at law, suit in equity, or other proper proceeding for redress."

Petitioners cite Hurd v. Hodge, 334 U. S. 24, in support of their position that the Civil Rights Acts are violated by the laws establishing the dual school system of the District, but they admit in their brief that this case involved Section 42 of Title 8, U. S. C., and not Sections 41 or 43 of that title. Section 42 relates specifically and solely to the right "to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property." That, on the basis of Section 42, the restrictive covenant was held to be unenforceable in a federal court, is no ground for a contention that separate schools for the races violates the Civil Rights Acts when schools are not mentioned therein at all. Indeed, as will be pointed out hereinafter, all references to schools were specifically deleted from bills which became the Acts, and the Carr and Browne Junior High cases, supra, 86 U. S. App. D. C. 173, 182 F. 2d 14, decided subsequent to Hurd v. Hodge, eloquently set forth why the Civil Rights Acts do not apply to District of Columbia schools.

In the annotations found in the United States Code Annotated there are but two cases cited under the subdivision of "Education" in connection with application of these two sections of Title 8, U. S. C. One is a state decision, Cory v. Carter, 48 Ind., 327, 17 Am. Rep. 738, decided in 1874, and the other is Bluford v. Canada, decided by the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Missouri in 1940 and found in 32 Fed. Supp. 707.[24]

In the Indiana case the court had before it a statute which provided for the levying of school taxes on a uniform basis without regard to race or color of the owner of the property taxed, but further provided that the enumeration of children for school purposes should be in separate lists of white and colored children and that they should be educated in separate schools. The court pointed out that the Congress which submitted the Fourteenth Amendment to the States for ratification had, within a few days of that action, passed two acts providing for separate schools in the District of Columbia and that a later Congress, in 1873, passed an amendment to the separate school laws of the District but continued the dual system in effect. Commenting thereon the court said,

> "The action of Congress * * * is worthy of consideration as evincing the concurrent and aftermatured conviction of that body that there was nothing whatever in the amendment which pre> vented congress from separating the white and colored races, and placing them, as classes, in different schools, and that such separation was highly proper and conducive to the well-being of the races, and calculated to secure the peace, harmony, and welfare of the public; * * *.

> "This legislation of congress continues in force, at the present time, as a legislative construction of the fourteenth amendment, and as a legislative declaration of what was thought to be lawful, proper, and expedient under such amendment, by the same body that proposed such amendment to the States for their approval and ratification."

Similarity of the foregoing statement by the Supreme Court of Indiana in 1874 with the observation of Judge Prettyman in Carr v. Corning and Browne Junior High School Parent Teachers Association v. Magdeburger, supra. is noteworthy. The Indiana court, at page 752, speaking of what is now known as Section 41, Title 8 of the United States Code, said:

> "* * * admitting it to be valid, that it does not relate to or bear upon the right claimed in this case, for it purports only to confer upon negroes and mulattoes the right, in every State and Territory, to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold and convey real and personal property, and the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property as enjoyed by white citizens, and subjects them to like pains and penalties. * * *. In this nothing is left to inference. Every right intended is specified."

The court concluded that the Indiana statute violated neither the Constitution nor the Civil Rights Act.

In the modern case of Bluford v. Canada, supra, 32 F. Supp. 707, the action was grounded specifically upon Section

BLEED THROUGH

43 of Title 8 of the United States Code. It was brought by a Negro citizen of Missouri against the Registrar of the University of Missouri for his refusal to admit the plaintiff into the University to pursue a course in journalism. District Judge Collett, citing cases in this Court, said:

> "The State has the constitutional right to furnish equal facilities in separate schools if it so desires."

The Court then quoted from Cumming v. Board of Education, 175 U. S. 528, 545:

> "We may add that while all admit that the benefits and burdens of public taxation must be shared by citizens without discrimination against any class on account of their race, the education of the people in schools maintained by state taxation is a matter belonging to the respective states, and any interference on the part of Federal authority with the management of such schools cannot be justified except in the case of a clear and unmistakable disregard of rights secured by the supreme law of the land."

In dismissing the complaint Judge Collett said (p. 711):

> "Until and unless plaintiff alleges facts which demonstrate an unlawful deprivation of her constitutional rights defendant may not be held liable therefor."

It will be remembered that the complaint in the instant case shows on its face that the minor petitioners "do now attend a junior high school in said District."

But reliance on State or district court decisions is not necessary. This Court and the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit have both alluded to the close tie between the Civil Rights Act and the Fourteenth Amendment, and the latter court has pointed out why the dual school system of the District does not offend against the Act. In Hurd v. Hodge, supra, 334 U. S. 24, 32-33, Mr. Chief Justice Vinson for the Court said:

> "In considering * * * the kind of governmental action which the first section of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 was intended to prohibit, reference must be made to the scope and purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment; for that statute and the Amendment were closely related both in inception and in the objectives which Congress sought to achieve.
> "Both the Civil Rights Act of 1866 and the joint resolution which was later adopted as the Fourteenth Amendment were passed in the first session of the Thirty-ninth Congress. Frequent references to the Civil Rights Act are to be found in the record of the legislative debates on the adoption of the Amendment. It is clear that in many significant respects the statute and the Amendment were expressions of the same general congressional policy. Indeed, as the legislative debates reveal, one of the primary purposes of many members of Congress in supporting the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment was to incorporate the guarantees of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 in the organic law of the land. Others supported the adoption of the Amendment in order to eliminate doubt as to the constitutional validity of the Civil Rights Act as applied to the States."

In the Carr and Browne cases, supra, Judge Prettyman, for the District of Columbia Circuit Court, said at page 17:

> "We are not unmindful of the debates which occurred in Congress relative to the Civil Rights Act of April 9, 1866, the Fourteenth Amendment, and the Civil Rights Act of March 1, 1875. But the actions of Congress, the discussion in the Civil Rights Cases, and the fact that in 1862, 1864, 1866 and 1874 Congress * * * enacted legislation which > specifically provided for separation of the races in the schools of the District of Columbia, conclusively support our view of the Amendment and its effect."

While Judge Prettyman's conclusion needs no buttressing, it is interesting to note that opponents of the dual school system have pointed to the fact that bills introduced to accomplish the outlawing of separate schools in the District of Columbia failed of passage in the 40th, 41st and 42nd Congresses.[25] They also point out that the Civil Rights Act of 1875, as originally introduced by Senator Charles Sumner, forbade segregation throughout the United States in and outside the District of Columbia, "in conveyances, theaters, inns and schools," but that, as finally passed, the restriction against separation in schools was stricken therefrom.[26]

Moreover, Section 43 of Title 8, U.S.C. provides a right of action for "the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws." The Carr and Browne Junior High cases, supra, rightfully hold that education of colored children in separate schools of the District is not a deprivation of rights, privileges or immunities secured by the Constitution or laws. Hereinbefore it has been demonstrated that separate schools for colored children were intended to serve rather than deprive them.

Petitioners apparently regard or attempt to dignify the Civil Rights Act as a constitutional provision. At best the Civil Rights Act is only an Act of Congress. In effect then, they are saying that certain Acts of Congress violate other Acts of Congress. Unless, therefore, one accepts the unwarranted conclusion of petitioners that the series of enactments providing for the dual school system in the District does not require such separateness, their position regarding the alleged violation of the Civil Rights Act is untenable. Not only is there the presumption that Congress when legislating knows of and takes into account existing laws but, as hereinbefore pointed out, the resolution submitting the Fourteenth Amendment to the States, the Civil Rights Act, the separate school laws, and amendments to the latter two, were considered and enacted by the same sessions of Congress which necessarily had intimate knowledge of the problem. The last amendment of the Civil Rights Act was in 1870 and shortly thereafter in 1874 the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia were enacted. If, therefore, the provisions of the Civil Rights Acts of 1866 and 1870, upon which petitioners rely, ever required integration in the schools, that requirement was repealed by implication upon the passage by Congress of the Revised Statutes in 1874 reaffirming its conclusion that the District should have a dual school system.

The Dual School System of the District is Not in Violation of the Charter of the United Nations.

Petitioners contend that refusal to admit the minor petitioners to the Sousa Junior High School deprives them of fundamental freedoms in violation of certain sections of the Charter of the United Nations.

At the outset it must be noted that, in their brief, they have limited their charge to a violation of paragraph (c) of Article 55 of the Charter, whereas in their complaint filed in the District Court they made no such limitation but charged generally a violation of Article 55. This variation from the complaint to the brief is not accidental. When Article 55 is read as it appears in Chapter IX of the Charter with Sections (a) and (b) preceding Section (c), an entirely different view is obtained of the real purpose of the Section. Section 3 of Chapter I is also slightly misquoted in petitioners' brief. This, like Article 55(c), should be read in context with its surrounding sections for proper perspective. For clarity, Article 1, Chapter I, and Articles 55 and 56 of Chapter IX are set out in the margin in their entirety [27] exactly as they appear in 59 Stat. 1035 et seq., and in Department of State Publication 2353, International Organization and Conference Series 74.

Petitioners assert and emphasize that the United Nations Charter is a treaty to which the United States is a signatory and that under Article VI, Clause 2 of the Constitution, it is "the supreme Law of the Land."

[27] "Chapter I—Purposes and Principles—Article 1—The Purposes of the United Nations are:

1. To maintain international peace and security, and to that end: to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace, and for the suppression of acts of aggresion or other breaches of the peace, and to bring about by peaceful means, and in conformity with the principles of justice and international law, adjustment or settlement of international disputes or situations which might lead to a breach of the peace;

2. To develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, and to take other appropriate measures to strengthen universal peace;

3. To achieve international cooperation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural, or humanitarian character, and in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion; and

4. To be a center for harmonizing the actions of nations in the attainment of these common ends."

"Chapter IX—International Economic and Social Cooperation—Article 55—With a view to the creation of conditions of stability and well-being which are necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, the United Nations shall promote:

a. higher standards of living, full employment, and conditions of economic and social progress and development;

b. solutions of international economic, social, health, and related problems; and international cultural and educational cooperation; and

c. universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion.

Article 56—

All Members pledge themselves to take joint and separate action in cooperation with the Organization for the achievement of the purposes set forth in Article 55."

But, according to the Constitution and the decided cases, treaties are only a part of the supreme law of the land. As was said by this Court in Edye v. Robertson, 112 U.S. 580, at page 599:

> "A treaty is made by the President and the Senate. Statutes are made by the President, the Senate and the House of Representatives. The addition of the latter body to the other two in making a law certainly does not render it less entitled to respect in the matter of its repeal or modification than a treaty made by the other two. If there be any difference in this regard, it would seem to be in favor of an Act in which all three of the bodies participate."

It is fundamental in international law that there are two kinds of treaties — self-executing and non-self-executing. The latter does not supersede local laws which are inconsistent with it. In Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet. 253, 314, Chief Justice Marshall said:

> "* * * Our Constitution declares a treaty to be the law of the land. It is, consequently, to be regarded in courts of justice as equivalent to an Act of the Legislature, whenever it operates of itself without the aid of any legislative provision. But when the terms of the stipulation import a contract — when either of the parties engages to perform a particular act — the treaty addresses itself to the political, not the judicial department; and the Legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule for the court."

To the same effect see:

In Robertson v. General Electric Co., supra, Judge Parker, Senior Judge of the Fourth Circuit, on pages 500 and 501 of 32 F. 2d, cites and quotes from leading authorities on interpretation of treaties, including that of Foster v. Neilson, supra, an opinion of Attorney General William H. H. Miller, and the case of Rousseau v. Brown, 21 App. D.C. 73, and arrives at the same conclusion.

The latest decision on the point is that of Fujii v. State, 242 P. 2d 617. In that case the Supreme Court of California sitting en banc decided on April 17, 1952 that the same provisions of the United Nations Charter here relied on by petitioners were not intended to supersede existing domestic legislation. The opinion by Chief Justice Gibson of that court carefully analyzes and documents its discussion of the law of treaties and concludes, as do respondents, that Articles 1, 55 and 56 of the Charter are non-self-executing.

In the language of the court (p. 620):

> "It is clear that the provisions of the preamble and of Article 1 of the charter which are claimed to be in conflict with the alien land law are not self-executing. They state general purposes and objectives of the United Nations Organization and do not purport to impose legal obligations on the individual member nations or to create rights in private persons. It is equally clear that none of the other provisions relied on by plaintiff is self-executing. * * * Although the member nations have obligated themselves to cooperate with the international organization in promoting respect for, and observance of, human rights, it is plain that it was contemplated that future legislative action by the several nations would be required to accomplish the declared objectives, and there is nothing to indicate that these provisions were intended to become rules of law for the courts of this country upon the ratification of the charter.

> "The language used in Articles 55 and 56 is not the type customarily employed in treaties which have been held to be self-executing and to create rights and duties in individuals."

While the decision of the Supreme Court of California was not unanimous, all the judges concurred in the conclusion regarding the ineffectiveness of the United Nations Charter to supersede local laws.

The language concurred in by the two late Justices of this Court, Justice Rutledge and Justice Murphy, quoted by petitioners from Oyama v. California, 332 U. S. 633, when read in context, shows that it is but one paragraph, unnecessary to the conclusion, in a concurring opinion covering twenty-four printed pages, that the opinion of the Court covering fourteen printed pages and several dissenting opinions covering fifteen more printed pages failed to even mention the United Nations Charter, that the proposition involved in the case was the complete denial to Japanese aliens of the right to own land in California, and that while the late Justices Rutledge and Murphy allude to the provisions of the United Nations Charter as being a national pledge to which the alien land law of California does violence, they studiously avoided even suggesting that the federal law completely denying citizenship to the same persons is at all affected by these Charter provisions. Considered thus the expressions of these late lamented liberal justices lose the force that petitioners attribute to them. Neither do Justices Black and Douglas, in their mention of the provisions of Articles 55 and 56 of the Charter and the relationship of those provisions to the alien laws of California, make any reference to the federal law similarly discriminatory so far as Japanese aliens are concerned. It would be a strange construction, indeed, if the provisions of the Charter could be held to repeal a State law but not to repeal a federal statute having an identical basis for discrimination.

Parenthetically it may be noted that all distinctions for naturalization based on race have been repealed by Public Law 414, 82nd Congress, Chapter 477, 2nd Session (66 Stat. 163), which becomes effective December 24, 1952, but that law excludes from admission to the United States "(11) Aliens who are polygamists or who practice polygamy or advocate the practice of polygamy,"[28a] and makes less stringent the requirements for admission to this country of those who are the subject of religious persecution in other lands, "whether such persecution be evidenced by overt acts or by laws or governmental regulations that discriminate against such alien or any group to which he belongs because of his religious faith."[28b] Thus, the Congress, to whom ought to be made all applications for changes in law to meet modern concepts, has, long after the adoption of the United Nations Charter and after court decisions actually[29] are allegedly[30] holding that the provisions of the Charter strikes down existing local law and requires this country to take "separate action" to promote observance of "human rights," enacted legislation establishing limitations for admission into this country based on polygamy, a subject which may well, to other signatories of the Charter, be considered one of the "human rights," and making a distinction based on religion, albeit the intention is to help those persecuted.

On page 58 of their brief petitioners refer to the case of Balfour, Guthrie and Company v. United States, 90 F. Supp. 831. Reference to this opinion by District Judge Goodman of the Northern District of California, Southern Division, shows that the United Nations Organization was permitted to maintain a suit against the United States for loss of merchandise shipped by the UNO on a United States owned vessel under the "Suits in Admiralty Act" authorizing this type of suit against the United States, and by virtue of the existence of the United Nations Charter. The effect of the decision is simply that the United Nations Organization is an entity which may sue in its own name. As a matter of fact, in Curran v. City of New York, 77 N. Y. S. 2d 206 (affirmed 88 N.Y.S. 2d 924), also cited by petitioners, the Supreme Court of New York specifically held that the United Nations Organization cannot be sued by virtue of the provisions of the International Organizations Immunities Act, although that court also held that the United Nations Organization is a legal entity by virtue of the provisions of the Charter and is capable of owning land in the United States.

Judge Manley O. Hudson, one of the outstanding authorities in the field of international law,[31] after the decision of the Fujii case by the intermediate appellate court in California, 217 P. 2d 481, wrote an article thereon which is extremely critical of the opinion of the court which rendered the earlier decision. The article appears at page 543 et seq. of the American Journal of International Law for July 1950.

Judge Hudson, after pointing out that the Preamble of the United Nations Charter states that "'We the peoples of the United Nations' are determined 'to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights,'" and, reciting the provisions of Article I, Section 3 of the Charter, says:

"This statement of a general purpose of the Organization does not impose an obligation on the United States as a Member of the United Nations to take any specific action.

"Article 13 (1) provides that the General Assembly shall initiate studies and make recommendations for the purpose of

> "b. promoting international cooperation in the economic, social, cultural, educational, and health fields, and assisting in the realization of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion.

"This article relates entirely to the powers of the Assembly rather than to obligations of Members, and recommendations by the General Assembly do not have a binding character."

With reference to Article 56, he has the following to say:

> "* * * The obligation imposed by Article 56 is limited to cooperation with the United Nations. The extent and form of its cooperation are to be determined by the government of each Member."

It is obvious from the Charter itself that the framers did not intend that the provisions with reference to human rights and fundamental freedoms, as set forth in Article 55, should be self-executing or should have any binding effect upon Member nations. In Article 61 there is provision for the establishment of an Economic and Social Council to consist of 18 Members elected by the General Assembly. Article 62 provides for the Functions and Powers of the Economic and Social Council. The language of Section 2 of Article 62 is significant. It provides:

> "(2). It may make recommendations for the purpose of promoting respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all."

Sections 3 and 4 of Article 62 authorize the Economic and Social Council to prepare Draft Conventions for submission to the General Assembly, and to call international conferences on the subject.

Commenting on the provisions of Article 62 (2), supra, Judge Hudson says:

> "* * * This provision, like Article 13 (1), refers only to the competence of a principal organ of the United Nations, whose recommendations are not obligatory."

and goes on to point out that similar language in Article 76 relating to the trusteeship system "merely states an objective of the trusteeship system."

After reciting the general law as laid down in Foster v. Neilson, supra, 2 Pet. 253, and other cases, Judge Hudson continues:

> "* * * Of course a single treaty may contain both kinds of provisions—some which are, and some which are not, self-executing. This view was taken by Chief Justice Stone in Aguilar v. Standard Oil Co. (New Jersey) (1943), 318 U. S. 724, 738.

poses and create for the United States only obligations to cooperate in promoting certain ends. Insofar as the United States is concerned, they address themselves 'to the political, not to the judicial department; and the legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule for the Court.' Apart from action taken by Congress to implement them, the application of the Charter's human rights provisions is not for a court to undertake. * * *

"The 'human rights and fundamental freedoms' referred to in Article 1 (3) and 55 (c), 62 (2), and 76 (c) are not defined in the Charter of the United Nations. In the effort to promote 'respect for and and observance of' them, no organ of the United Nations has been endowed with legislative power. * * *" (Emphasis supplied.)

A commission created under Article 68 of the Charter drafted what is denominated the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which was adopted by the General Assembly on December 10, 1948.[32] The General Assembly proclaimed this Declaration:

"as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this Declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance, both among the peoples of Member States themselves and among the peoples of territories under their jurisdiction."

Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, the representative of the United States, speaking about the Declaration on the day before its adoption said:[33]

> "* * * my Government has made it clear in the course of the development of the declaration that it does not consider that the economic and social and cultural rights stated in the declaration imply an obligation on governments to assure the enjoyment of these rights by direct governmental action. * * *"

Previously, before the Third Committee of the General Assembly, Mrs. Roosevelt stated that "the draft Declaration was not a treaty or international agreement," and that if it was adopted it would not be "legally binding."[34]

Commenting in his article on these official proclamations and statements, Judge Hudson said:

> "After these official statements, no doubt can exist as to the character of the Declaration. It is in no sense binding on the Government of the United States, and its provisions have not been incorporated in our national law."

Judge Hudson reaches the following conclusions concerning the first Fujii (intermediate appellate court) decision:

> "The Human Rights Commission of the United Nations is now engaged in drafting a second instrument—a Covenant on Human Rights. If this Covenant is signed and ratified by the United States, and if it is brought into force by a sufficient number of nations, it will be on a wholly different basis from that of the Declaration. It is designed to be a treaty between various nations. As such, depending on a text which has not yet been finalized, its self-executing provisions might be incorporated into American law; the United States is currently insisting that its provisions should not be self-executing. The California court would seem to have anticipated events which may or may not transpire in the future." (Emphasis supplied.)

> "Clearly a court is not the appropriate agency to determine for the Government of the United States the particular way in which it should 'cooperate with the United Nations.' * * *"

Not only, as has been demonstrated, are the provisions of the Charter themselves indicative that they are not binding upon Member Nations so far as the statements therein contained relate to "human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion," but the statement of Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., Chairman of the United States Delegation to the San Francisco Conference which drafted the Charter, in his report to the President of the United States bears this out. The report, dated June 26, 1945,[35] by the then Secretary of State, says in part:

> "The pledge as finally adopted was worded to eliminate such possible interpretation. It pledges the various countries to cooperate with the organization by joint and separate action in the achievement of the economic and social objectives of the organization without infringing upon their right to order their national affairs according to their own best ability, in their own way, and in accordance with their own political and economic institutions and processes. (Emphasis supplied.)
> "To remove all possible doubt on this score the following statement was unanimously approved and included in the record of the Conference (Report of the Rapporteur of Committee 3 of Commission II):
>
> > 'The members of Committee 3 of Commission II are in full agreement that nothing contained in Chapter IX (which contains Articles 55 and 56) can be construed as giving authority to the Organization to intervene in the domestic affairs of member states."[36] (Emphasis supplied.)

Mr. Stettinius also stressed this point in the hearings on the Charter before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations in 1945, as follows:

> "Because the United Nations is an organization of sovereign states, the General Assembly does not have legislative power. It can recommend, but it cannot impose its recommendations upon the member states." [37]

The same point was emphasized by Mr. Leo Pasvolsky, one of the American draftsmen of the Charter, who gave the following explanation of the Chapter of the Charter which contains Articles 55 and 56:

> "The objective here is to build up a system of international cooperation in the promotion of all of these important matters. The powers given to the Assembly in the economic and social fields in these respects are in no way the powers of imposition; they are powers of recommendation: powers of coordination through recommendation."[38]

The fact that, under the United Nations Charter, provision in made for an Economic and Social Council and that action has been taken to adopt a Declaration of Human Rights, indicates, of itself, that the pledges in the Charter by the signatory powers requiring them to promote "universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion," is nothing more than a statement of principles not binding on the signatory powers without individual action by the legislative authority of each. The further fact that the United Nations Organization is now preparing for submission to the Member nations a Covenant on Human Rights to further implement the provisions of the Charter is additional evidence of this fact. In a recent address, David A. Simmons, Esq., former President of the American Bar Association, a member of the Committee on the United Nations of the American Bar Association, and, with Judge Joseph M. Proskauer, the draftman at San Francisco of the original Human Rights provisions in the United Nations Charter, said:

> "The particular rights that had been discussed by the consultants, and those that at least this consultant had in mind, were the ones declared in our Bill of Rights. These include the right to life, liberty and property, equality before the law, immunity from torture and inhuman punishment, presumption of innocence, a fair and open trial, the right to counsel, no ex post facto laws, and, of course, freedom of speech, freedom of religion, and the right of assembly. Our concern was that other people of the globe, who were subjects with no assertable rights, should be entitled to the same rights which our forefathers attained for us and which, by several wars, we have preserved for ourselves and extended to others."[39] (Emphasis supplied.)

This statement indicates that the intention was to protect only the human rights and fundamental freedoms protected by the American Constitution and, since dual school systems have been held to be constitutional, the elimination of separate schools was not among the items the drafters had in mind.

Articles 55 and 56 of the Charter contain no definitions of "human rights" or "fundamental freedoms." In Article 55 the signatory powers pledge themselves to promote "universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion." But the civil and social standards and the ideals of the fifty-odd Member Nations are widely divergent. The United States, for instance, considers polygamy to be contrary to its ideology and social standards. Another nation may consider polygamy to be a human right and a fundamental freedom.

It is understood that some of the nations of the near east separte their children in schools by sexes. Is this a "fundamental freedom" with them, and, as used in Article 55, does fundamental freedom without distinction as to sex mean that a member nation must or must not separate its children by sex?

How divergent are political rights for women among the many nations that comprise the United Nations Organization? The United States considers political rights for women as being a fundamental freedom. Yet it is recognized that sharp distinctions between the sexes may be made by legislatures. "Just a short time ago the State of Connecticut adopted a law barring women from standing at bars even if they are not drinking[40]  the State of Washington passed a law making it unlawful to sell liquor to women except when seated at tables. * * *.'"[41] Such distinctions would not be held violative of the Constitution, yet, if petitioners be right in their contention, all these laws would be struck down by Article 55 of the United Nations Charter. In upholding a law of Michigan denying a license as a bartender to any female unless she be the wife or daughter of the male owner of a licensed liquor establishment, Mr. Justice Frankfurter for the Court in Goesaert v. Cleary, 325 U. S. 464, 465-466 (a case decided more than three years after the ratification by the United States of the United Nations Charter) said:

> "Michigan could, beyond question, forbid all women from working behind a bar. This is so despite the vast changes in the social and legal position of women. * * * The Constitution does not require legislatures to reflect sociological insight, or shifting social standards, any more than it requires them to keep abreast of the latest scientific standards."

Without extended research, it may be asserted without fear of contradiction that the right of a man to rid himself of an unwanted wife is as easy or as difficult among the many Member nations as it is among the 48 States of the United States. Again without extended research, there is strong likelihood that among the human rights and fundamental freedoms of some nations of the world who are members of the United Nations all property must be held by males and cannot be titled in females, all of which is contrary to our concept.

The provisions contended for by the petitioners as being the law of the land and invalidating laws prescribing a dual school system in the District of Columbia relate to distinctions as to sex as well as race. If they be correct, then the laws in the District of Columbia providing limited working hours[42] and minimum pay [43] for females are also violative of the United Nations Charter, and the provisions of the local law giving preference to women in the allowance of alimony,[44] maintenance,[45] and counsel fees[46] would be now in violation of the law of the land. These may seem to be absurdities, but they are necessary implications from the position assumed by petitioners. If they are absurdities, then the proposition that provisions of the United Nations Charter make invalid Acts of Congress providing for a dual school system in the District of Columbia is no less absurd.

VI

Laws Providing for a Dual School System Do Not Constitute a Bill of Attainder.

Paragraph 14 of the complaint filed by petitioners in the District Court reads as follows:

> "14. The defendants, and each of them, are construing and applying Acts of Congress so as to require them to deny to the minor plaintiffs, and other Negro children similarly situated, admission to and to exclude them from attendance as pupils at the Sousa Junior High School for no other reason than because of their race or color, in violation of Article I, Section 9, Clause 3, of the Constitution of the United States which forbids a Bill of Attainder."

Although the charge in the complaint is that the construction of certain Acts of Congress by the respondents requires them to engage in conduct which violates the constitutional provision against a Bill of Attainder, the contention in their brief is that there is a direct violation of Article I, Section 9 of the Constitution. It is undisputed that Article I, Section 9 of the Constitution relates to powers denied to Congress and not to powers denied to District school officials or to the Board of Education of the District of Columbia. Nowhere in the complaint is there a charge that Congress, against whom the prohibition of Article I, Section 9 of the Constitution is directed, has passsed a Bill of Attainder. The complaint in this regard is, therefore, deficient, and this deficiency affords the Court ground for disregarding the contention that Article I, Section 9 of the Constitution has been violated.

Respondents have, however, a complete answer to the proposition on its merits. The Acts of Congress allegedly unlawfully construed are not specified, but obviously the allusion is to the Acts of Congress set forth in Appendix A and referred to in the case of Carr v. Corning, supra, 86 U. S. App. D. C. 173, 182 F. 2d 14, which provide for a dual school system in the District of Columbia.

The constitutional prohibition against Bills of Attainder so far as the Federal Government is concerned (and, indeed, so far as the States are concerned as that prohibition is set forth in Article I, Section 10 of the Constitution) has existed from the time of the adoption of the Constitution in 1789. It is remarkable that, with the numerous attacks on dual school systems over the years, no one has ever suggested heretofore that laws establishing them constitute a Bill of Attainder. This Court has remarked upon an analogous situation in Stainback v. Mo Hock Ke Lok Po, 336 U. S. 368. In passing upon the question of the invocation of a three-judge court in the case of an attack upon the constitutionality of an act of the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, the Court said at page 379:

> "While it is sometimes said that action, where the power to act is unquestioned, can hardly be said to be a precedent for a future case, where as here the responsibility was on the courts to see that the three-judge rule was followed, we think it significant that no one sought to apply § 266 to Hawaii."

Two recent cases decided by this Court on the subject of Bill of Attainder are Garner v. Board of Public Works of Los Angeles, 341 U. S. 716, and United States v. Lovett, et al., 328 U. S. 303, in both of which the Court reviewed and analyzed at length the law and early decisions concerning Bills of Attainder.

The Garner case relates to a municipal ordinance requiring loyalty oaths and affidavits.

United States v. Lovett was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Claims allowing to Robert M. Lovett, Goodwin B. Watson and William E. Dodd, Jr., recovery against the United States for services rendered the Federal Government. Congress, in the Urgent Deficiency Appropriation Act of 1943, provided that no part of the funds made available under that or any other Act should be used to pay any part of the salary or compensation of Watson and Dodd after November 15, 1943 unless, prior to that date, they were appointed to positions in the government service by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. In the opinion by Mr. Justice Black, the Court affirmed the judgment of the Court of Claims, holding that the above provision of the Urgent Deficiency Appropriation Act of 1943 constituted a Bill of Attainder. It was pointed out that, from the hearings and debate which preceded the passage of the Act, the purpose of Congress was (p. 314)

> "clearly * * * to 'purge' the then existing and all future lists of Government employees of those whom Congress deemed guilty of 'subversive activities' and therefore 'unfit' to hold a federal job. What was challenged, therefore, is a statute which, because of what Congress thought to be their political beliefs, prohibited respondents from ever engaging in any government work, except as jurors or soldiers."

The Court, (p. 315) quoting from Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 277, 323, defined a Bill of Attainder as follows:

> "A bill of attainder is a legislative Act, which inflicts punishment without a judicial trial. If the punishment be less than death, the act is termed a bill of pains and penalties. Within the meaning of the Constitution, bills of attainder include bills of pains and penalties."

Further referring to the Cummings case and the case of Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. 333, the Court said:

> "Neither of these cases has ever been overruled. They stand for the proposition that legislative acts, no matter what their form, that apply either to named individuals or to easily ascertainable members of a group in such a way as to inflict punishment on them without a judicial trial are bills of attainder prohibited by the Constitution."

Applying this rule to the situation then before the Court in the Lovett case, Mr. Justice Black said (p. 316):

> "This permanent proscription from any opportunity to serve the Government is punishment, and of a most severe type. It is a type of punishment which Congress has only invoked for special types of odious and dangerous crimes, such as treason, * * * acceptance of bribes by members of Congress, * * * or by other government officials, * * * and interference with elections by Army and Navy officers * * *."

There is nothing in the complaint which shows, as to these petitioners, punishments of any kind or conditions such as those which prompted the Court to declare an Act of Congress a Bill of Attainder in the Lovett case or in any of the cases alluded to in that opinion. Lovett, Watson and Dodd were singled out by name for attainder by Congress and were absolutely prohibited, to all intents, from thereafter working for the Federal Government, because Congress decided, without a judicial trial, that these three men were guilty of subversive activities and unfit to hold a federal job. They were convicted without judicial proceedings, which is the very abuse against which the prohibition was written into the Constitution.

The petitioners herein and others similarly situated have not been convicted nor has punishment been inflicted upon them without judicial trial; neither have they been denied the right to receive education. The attention of the Court is again invited to the allegation in paragraph 3 of the complaint that the minor petitioners "do now attend a junior high school in said District," and to the fact that, for aught that appears of record, they therein receive all the educational opportunities afforded to any child in any junior high school.

The Cummings case, supra, involved a Catholic priest who was convicted of preaching as a minister without taking an oath of loyalty as a prerequisite to practicing his profession, and the Garland case, supra, involved an attorney who sought leave to practice his profession without taking a similar oath.

In the Garland case, Mr. Justice Field, who wrote the opinion for the Court in both that case and the Cummings case, said, at p. 377:

> "As the oath prescribed cannot be taken by these parties, the act, as against them, operates as a legislative decree of perpetual exclusion. And exclusion from any of the professions or any of the ordinary avocations of life for past conduct can be regarded in no other light than as punishment for such conduct."

The full description of a Bill of Attainder as found at page 323 in the Cummings case is as follows:

> "A bill of attainder is a legislative act, which inflicts punishment without a judicial trial. If the punishment be less than death, the act is termed a bill of pains and penalties. Within the meaning of the Constitution, bills of attainder include bills of pains and penalties. In these cases the legislative body, in addition to its legitimate functions, exercises the powers and office of judge; it assumes, in the language of the text books, judicial magistracy; it pronounces upon the guilt of the party, without any of the forms or safeguards of trial; it determines the sufficiency of the proofs produced, whether conformable to the rules of evidence or otherwise; and it fixes the degree of punishment in accordance with its own notions of the enormity of the offense."

Referring to the requirement of an oath of loyalty from members of the clergy, the Court in the Cummings case said (p. 320):

> "The oath could not, therefore, have been required as a means of ascertaining whether parties were qualified or not for their respective callings or the trusts with which they were charged. It was required in order to reach the person, not the calling. It was exacted, not from any notion that the several acts designated indicated unfitness for the callings, but because it was thought that the several acts deserved punishment, and that for many of them there was no way to inflict punishment except by depriving the parties who had committed them of some of the rights and privileges of the citizen."

Further, on the same page, the Court made the observation:

"The deprivation of any rights, civil or political, previously enjoyed, may be punishment; * * *."

In the very recent Garner case, supra, 341 U. S. 716, 722, Mr. Justice Clark for the Court affirmed this observation of Mr. Justice Field in 1867, holding that "punishment is a prerequisite." To constitute punishment, he said, there is a requirement of deprivation of [illegible] privilege previously enjoyed."

How can there possibly be claimed to be punishment in the sense required for a Bill of Attainder where the minor petitioners have never "previously enjoyed" education in the District of Columbia in an integrated school system?

Petitioners attempt to torture the definition of a Bill of Attainder to establish their point. On some four pages, commencing with page 37 of their brief, they cite and quote from a substantial number of publications to draw respondents into a psychological, anthropological and sociological discussion on the effects of social and other distinctions between the white and colored pupils of America. Among these are names of psychologists and references found in "Appendix to Appellants' Brief" filed jointly in the pending companion cases of Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, Briggs v. Elliott and Davis v. County School Board of Prince Edwards County, Nos. 8, 101 and 191, respectively. Respondents neither concede as true that which is attempted to be established by the references, nor take issue therewith. They point out, however, that statements[47] and writings[48] of other scientists do take issue with those cited by petitioners and those set forth in the "Appendix". Analysis of the social-scientific references cited in opposition to the dual school system shows that much of the material cannot even be classified as scientific conclusion. It is nothing more than expression of opinion. The senior circuit judge of the United States characterized it in Briggs v. Elliott, 98 F. Supp. 529, 537 as "theories advanced by a few educators and sociologists." In this connection, the attention of the Court is invited to the testimony of Dr. Henry E. Garrett, head of the department of psychology of Columbia University, at the trial before the district court in Richmond in the Davis case, that psychology is a very young science,[49] that results of psychological tests are subject to interpretation by the testor, and that, accordingly, the predilection of the psychologist conducting a test may strongly influence the conclusion to be derived therefrom.[50] Accordingly, the theories of the social scientists relied upon by petitioners are not entitled to consideration as the coldly impartial findings of objective searchers for truth. But even if they had that dignity, it is respondents' position that such theories do not constitute a valid basis for the reversal by this Court of the long line of its holdings ever since the Civil War, and the necessary result of such reversal: amendment of the Constitution of the United States by construction.

Even if there are ill effects, as contended by petitioners, they cannot be classified as punishments as that term is used in the definition of a Bill of Attainder. The laws requiring a dual school system were not enacted with any idea of deprivation or of denial or of punishment, nor was there any intention to take away something which formerly was had by the "easily ascertainable group." On the contrary, the laws setting up schools for colored were enacted at a time when members of that race were afforded no schooling whatsoever. The purpose of the laws was to give rather than to take away, was to afford opportunity rather than deny opportunity, was to aid rather than to punish. Twist, turn and torture the words as they may, petitioners cannot make bills of pains and penalties or bills of attainder out of laws setting up schools for a people who were once deprived of education.

CONCLUSION

The position of the respondents with regard to the attack upon the maintenance of a dual school system in the District of Columbia is, (1) that sections of the Revised Statutes and subsequent enactments by Congress require the maintenance of that system, (2) that this Court and the highest court of the District have so held, (3) that the principle of separation of the races in schools and otherwise does not violate the Civil Rights Act nor the United Nations Charter and does not violate either the Fourteenth Amendment, which provides for "equal protection of the laws," nor the Fifth Amendment which has no equal protection clause, (4) that if the time has come to integrate the schools of the District of Columbia the reasons therefor and the arguments in favor thereof should be placed before the Congress who made the laws, and (5) the Court should not be asked to, nor should it when asked, disturb the situation as it finds it, however strongly the Justices may be impressed with arguments for the need of change.

The position which the Court should take in this controversy, it seems to respondents, is best summed up by expressions made or concurred in by such eminent jurists as Justices Cardozo, Brandeis and Stone. In United States v. Constantine, 296 U. S. 287, 298-299, all three concurred in this dissenting language by Mr. Justice Cardozo:

> "The judgment of the court, if I interpret the reasoning aright, does not rest upon a ruling that Congress would have gone beyond its power if the purpose that it professed was the purpose truly cherished. The judgment of the court rests upon the ruling that another purpose, not professed, may be read beneath the surface, and by the purpose so imputed the statute is destroyed. Thus the process of psychoanalysis has spread to unaccustomed fields. There is a wise and ancient doctrine that a court will not inquire into the motives of a legislative body or assume them to be wrongful. Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch 87, 130; Magnano Co. v. Hamilton, 292 U. S. 40, 44. There is another wise and ancient doctrine that a court will not adjudge the invalidity of a statute except for manifest necessity. Every reasonable doubt must have been explored and extinguished before moving to that grave conclusion. Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 213, 270. The warning sounded by this court in the Sinking-Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 700, 718, has lost none of its signifiance. 'Every possible presumption is in favor of the validity of a statute, and this continues until the contrary is shown beyond a rational doubt. One branch of the government cannot encroach on the domain of another without danger. The safety of our in> stitutions depends in no small degree on a strict observance of this salutary rule.' I cannot rid myself of the conviction that in the imputation to the lawmakers of a purpose not professed, this salutary rule of caution is now forgotten or neglected after all the many protestations of its cogency and virtue."

In United States v. Butler, supra, 297 U. S. 1, Mr. Justice Stone said at page 78-79:

> "The power of courts to declare a statute unconstitutional is subject to two guiding principles of decision which ought never to be absent from judicial consciousness. One is that courts are concerned only with the power to enact statutes, not with their wisdom. The other is that while unconstitutional exercise of power by the executive and legislative branches of the government is subject to judicial restraint, the only check upon our own exercise of power is our own sense of self-restraint. For the removal of unwise laws from the statute books appeal lies not to the courts but to the ballot and to the processes of democratic government."

Finally, respondents adopt the language of Chief Judge Parker in one of the latter paragraphs of Briggs v. Elliott, supra, 98 F. Supp. 529:

> "To this we may add that, when seventeen states and the Congress of the United States have for more than three quarters of a century required segregation of the races in the public schools, and when this has received the approval of the leading appellate courts of the country including the unanimous approval of the Supreme Court of the United States at a time when that court included Chief Justice Taft and Justices Stone, Holmes and Brandeis, it is a late day to say that such segregation is violative of fundamental constitutional rights. It is hardly reasonable to suppose that legislative bodies over so wide a territory, including the Congress of the United States, and great judges of high courts have knowingly defied the Constitution for so long a period or that they have acted in ignorance of the meaning of its provisions. The constitutional principle is the same now that it has been throughout this period; and if conditions have changed so that segregation is no longer wise, this is a matter for the legislatures and not for the courts. The members of the judiciary have no more right to read their ideas of sociology into the Constitution than their ideas of economics."

It is respectfully submitted that the judgment of the District Court is correct and should be affirmed.

Sec. 283. The school-board is authorized to receive any donations or contributions that may be made for the benefit of the schools for colored children by persons disposed to aid in the elevation of the colored population in the District, and to apply the same in such manner as in their opinion shall be best calculated to effect the object of the donors; the school-bard to account for all funds so received, and to report the same to the legislative assembly.

Sec. 306. It shall be the duty of the proper authorities of the District to set apart each year from the whole fund received from all sources by such authorities applicable to purposes of public education in the cities of Washington and Georgetown such a proportionate part of all moneys received or expended for school or educational purposes in said cities, including the cost of sites, buildings, improvements, furniture, and books, and all other expenditures on account of schools, as the colored children between the ages of six and seventeen years in the respective cities bear to the whole number of children, white and colored, between the same ages, for the purpose of establishing and sustaining public schools in said cities for the education of colored children; and such proportion shall be ascertained by the last reported census of the population of said cities made prior to such apportionment, and shall be regulated at all times thereby.

Sec. 310. It is made the duty of the trustees to provide suitable rooms and teachers for such a number of schools in Washington and Georgetown as, in their opinion, will best accommodate the colored children in the various portions of said cities.

Sec. 314. The funds obtained for educational purposes in accordance with the preceding section shall be applied to the education of both white and colored children, in the proportion of the numbers of each between the ages of six and seventeen years, as determined by the latest census report that shall have been made prior to such apportionment.

Sec. 1296. All acts of Congress passed prior to the first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, relating to the District of Columbia, any portion of which is embraced in the foregoing revision are hereby repealed; and the section applicable thereto shall be in force in lieu thereof; and this revision of the acts of Congress relating to the District of Columbia shall be subject to, and governed by the provisions of chapter seventy-four of the Revised Statutes of the United States, entitled "Repeal Provisions."

Brief for Respondents on Reargument

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT AND SCOPE OF BRIEF

A final judgment of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia dismissing a complaint for injunction and declaratory judgment is here for review, by writ of certiorari, before judgment by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. The petitioners, plaintiffs in the District Court, sought admission to the Sousa Junior High School, a junior high school in Division 1 of the public school system of the District of Columbia, which division encompasses the several schools for white pupils, contending that the separation of white and Negro children in the public schools violates Articles I, Sec. 9, Clause 3 of the Constitution of the United States, the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, Title 8, Sections 41 and 43 of the United States Code, and Chapter I, Article 1, Section 3 and Chapter IX, Articles 55 and 56 of the Charter of the United Nations.

Oral argument was heard by this Court on December 10th and 11th, 1952.

On June 8, 1953 an order was issued restoring this and four companion cases to the docket and assigning them for rebriefing and reargument. Because certain terms of the order are believed to be specially significant in the matter of the scope of this brief, the order is set forth below with those terms emphasized.

Citation of the Opinion Below, the statements of the Grounds of Jurisdiction and Questions Presented, and the respondents' version of a proper Statement of the Case are set forth on pages 2-5 of the Brief for Respondents filed at the October Term 1952, and will not be here repeated.

The Order of June 8, 1953

(With Emphasis Supplied)

"Each of these cases is ordered restored to the docket and is assigned for reargument on Monday, October 12, next. In their briefs and on oral argument counsel are requested to discuss particularly the following questions insofar as they are relevant to the respective cases:

"1. What evidence is there that the Congress which submitted and the State legislatures and conventions which ratified the Fourteenth Amendment contemplated or did not contemplate, understood or did not understand, that it would abolish segregation in public schools?

"2. If neither the Congress in submitting nor the States in ratifying the Fourteenth Amendment understood that compliance with it would require the immediate abolition of segregation in public schools, was it nevertheless the understanding of the framers of the Amendment

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(a) that future Congresses might, in the exercise of their power under § 5 of the Amendment, abolish such segregation, or

(b) that it would be within the judicial power, in light of future conditions, to construe the Amendment as abolishing such segregation of its own force?

"3. On the assumption that the answers to questions 2(a) and (b) do not dispose of the issue, is it within the judicial power, in construing the Amendment, to abolish segregation in public schools?

"4. Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment,

(a) would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, or

(b) may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?

"5. On the assumption on which questions 4(a) and (b) are based, and assuming further that this Court will exercise its equity powers to the end described in question 4(b),

(a) should this Court formulate detailed decrees in these cases;

(b) if so what specific issues should the decrees reach;

(c) should this Court appoint a special master to hear evidence with a view to recommending specific terms for such decrees;

(d) should this Court remand to the courts of first instance with directions to frame decrees in these cases, and if so what general directions should the decrees of this Court include and what procedures should the courts of first instance follow in arriving at the specific terms of more detailed decrees?

> "The Attorney General of the United States is invited to take part in the oral argument and to file an additional brief if he so desires."

The emphasized words in the foregoing quotation of the Court's order demonstrate that all of the questions are intimately related to the 14th Amendment. Prior decisions support the view of counsel that the Court recognized that the Amendment applies only to the four State cases and anticipated that the questions would, therefore, not be relevant to the District case. In Wight v. Davidson, 181 U. S. 371, 384, the Court said:

> "* * * the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, * * *, in terms, operates only to control action of the states, and does not purport to extend to authority exercised by the government of the United States."

Indeed, it appears that not only does the 14th Amendment not apply to the Congress when legislating for the District, but this Court, on the same day that it announced the decision in Wight v. Davidson, said in Cass Farm Co. v. Detroit, 181 U. S. 395, 398, with reference to the 14th Amendment:

> "* * * that Amendment legitimately operates to extend to the citizens and residents of the states the same protection against arbitrary state legislation affecting life, liberty, and property as is afforded by the 5th Amendment against similar legislation by Congress, * * *."

In a number of places in their Brief on Reargument,[1] particularly on page 89, petitioners take the same view as do the respondents: that only the Fifth Amendment has any bearing on the constitutionality of laws providing for a dual school system in the District of Columbia. Regarding locally applicable constitutional provisions, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit held that "The equal-protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment does not apply, that Amendment being directed to the states."[2]

This being so, counsel for respondents are of the opinion that none of the questions as propounded by the Court in its order of June 8th is relevant to this case. They nevertheless believe that they should endeavor to assist the Court by setting forth applicable principles that would come into play if the 4th and 5th questions propounded by the Court were predicated on a violation of the Fifth Amendment rather than the Fourteenth. Apparently petitioners' counsel also concluded that the first three questions propounded in the Court's order of June 8 last are inapplicable to the District for, in their Brief on Reargument, they have not undertaken to specifically answer any but the fourth and fifth questions.

While the Court's order of June 8, 1953 does not in terms preclude rebriefing and reargument of the whole question before the Court, it was, and still is, the view of counsel for respondents that the principal subject was completely and fully briefed at the October Term 1952 and that, in approximately ten hours of argument by counsel in the five pending cases involving the subject of separation of races in education, the Court had heard about all of the argument that it desired on those aspects of the subject outside the scope of the Court's questions. Petitioners, however, in addition to replying to the last two of the Court's questions, have filed a lengthy brief touching upon all of the points heretofore raised by them. A study of the brief shows that it actually contains not a single additional point beyond that which was contained in the original brief filed on behalf of petitioners, although it does attempt to lay special emphasis upon and to enlarge on one phase of the matter. Because counsel for respondents believe that the Brief for Respondents filed in 1952 is a complete refutation of all points raised by petitioners in both of the briefs submitted by them, this brief shall contain only answers to the Court's 4th and 5th questions and a general statement of respondents' position.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Accomplishment of integration of the two separate school systems in the District of Columbia or elsewhere requires something more than mere reshuffling of the pupils, and, therefore, immediate transition from the dual to a single school system, in the event the former is declared unconstitutional, does not necessarily follow. Proper indoctrination and instruction of teachers, and passage of necessary legislation, including appropriations for required changes, make the immediate change to a unified local system impossible.

Although no gradual adjustment appears necessary in the District of Columbia and none is recommended by respondents, the Court's equity powers are broad enough to permit such adjustment from a dual to an integrated school system, particularly in the light of the equality of facilities afforded petitioners under the prevailing system.

The magnitude of the problems encompassed in arranging for integration of schools in the several jurisdictions directly involved in the five cases before the Court is such that the framing of a detailed decree by this Court, even with the assistance of a Special Master, is not feasible. If separate schools for the races are declared unconstitutional, cognizance should be taken by this Court of the necessity for proper preparation for integration and the cases should be remanded to the respective district courts with instructions to order prompt preparation for integration and to order actual commencement and completion of integration within a reasonable period of time.

ARGUMENT

I

Question 4(a)—In the Event that Separate Schools for White and Negro Children are Declared Unconstitutional, Immediate Transition from the Dual to a Single School System Does Not Necessarily Follow

Assuming that the Court should decide that segregation of the races in public schools is violative of the Constitution, it does not necessarily follow that, within the limits set by normal geographical school districting, either Negro or white children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice. In making this assertion counsel for respondents do not embrace the other extreme embodied as one suggestion made in the brief filed at the October Term 1952 by the United States as amicus curiae that integration of pupils be commenced on a first-grade level and extended by grades annually so as to stretch out over a twelve year period. It is conceded that, if necessary, a reshuffling of white and Negro pupils in the schools of the District of Columbia could be accomplished within a comparatively short time by a simple directive. But reshuffling of pupils alone does not effect integration of two presently independent school systems. "Integrate", as defined in Webster's New International Dictionary (2nd Ed. Unabridged-1946), means, inter alia,:

> "To form into one whole, to make entire, to complete, to round out; to perfect." (Emphasis supplied.)

If the elimination of the dual school system is to afford even the minimum benefits which are claimed for a unified system, the transformation must, indeed, be rounded out and perfected. Mere recitation of figures demonstrates the magnitude of the undertaking. In early November there were approximately 104,000 children in the public schools of the District, divided about 45,000 white and about 59,000 Negro. Seventeen hundred white and eighteen hundred Negro teachers, a total of about 3,500, were provided for instruction of these pupils.[3]

Counsel for respondents make no dire predictions of widespread bloodshed among intermingled pupils of the two races, but past experience in the field of local recreation[4] leads to the conclusion that some conflict is possible if proper preparation is not made and if supervising personnel are not adequately trained to guide the children. That tension between the races has existed elsewhere for many years and that numerous serious clashes have occurred as a result thereof was recognized by this Court as recently as April 28, 1952 in Beauharnais v. Illinois, 343 U. S. 250, 258-261. In both the Court's opinion and in dissents in that case are found such expressions as: (p. 259) "From the murder of the abolitionist Lovejoy in 1837 to the Cicero riots of 1951, Illinois has been the scene of exacerbated tension between races, often flaring into violence and destruction"; (p. 261-262) "• • • tension and on occasion violence between racial and religious groups must be traced to causes more deeply embedded in our society than the rantings of modern Know-Nothings"; (p. 273) "But emotions bubble and tempers flare in racial • • • controversies • • •"; (p. 283) "Racial • • • biases and prejudices lead to charge and counter-charge, acrimony and bitterness".

In addition to the training given to the United States Park Police in 1949[5] (with refresher courses given annually thereafter), the Recreation Department of the District of Columbia, to properly prepare its personnel for interracial use of playgrounds (which, as pointed out in Petitioners' Brief on Reargument, is progressing in the District), recently completed a six-weeks course in inter-group relations for 36 of its workers.[6] As in any field of education, the number of those instructed was necessarily limited by the number that could be accommodated in one class. It must be remembered in connection with these programs of instruction that participation in recreation is on a voluntary basis, whereas attendance at school is compulsory, and that, accordingly, the need for instruction in proper handling of regrouped children in schools is even greater than in the recreation field.

It would seem that in order to round out and perfect the regrouping of 104,000 children in a community as far south as Washington, proper indoctrination of the 3500 teachers in the principles of inter-group relations is a prerequisite. Not only would such an educational program amongst this number of teachers consume a substantial amount of time for the teachers themselves, but the problems of locating suitable instructors in the subject and of financing the program are important considerations. The latter item would, of course, require appropriation of funds by the Congress both for the salary of the teachers while in training and for paying their instructors. The amount of time necessary to obtain such appropriations is unpredictable.

The prior preparation of teachers and of the public for integration is a subject that has been a matter of study in the past. In a bulletin published by the United States Office of Education (now a part of the U. S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare) entitled "Education of Teachers for Improving Majority-Minority Relationships"[7] prepared by Dr. Ambrose Caliver, eminent Negro educator and Senior Specialist in the Education of Negroes in the United States Office of Education, the following is found:

> "Conditions which are likely to prevail at the close of the present crisis demand that we know all our neighbors better, and that we attain knowledge of them as quickly as possible. This demand suggests the need of consideration of ways and means. One important agency we have to spread such knowledge is the schools, and teachers are the chief means, but they must first be prepared. Their interests, information, and attitudes must be developed in such a manner as to give them an appreciation of their responsibility to understand the profound social changes that are taking place, and a determination to help their pupils make the required transition as effectively as possible."[8]
> "Another matter that is of extreme importance in developing better race relations through the schools is the attitude of the teacher. * * * The purpose of such courses is to influence the attitude of prospective teachers, who in turn will influence the pupils in the schools. The setting and atmosphere in which the course is conducted, which have an important effect in developing proper attitudes toward different minority groups, are largely provided by the attitude of the teacher."[9] (Emphasis supplied.)

Among other things, the publication above referred to reviews the facilities available to teachers for training in race relations and the author concludes that the facilities provided in the Nation's colleges and universities are few in number, poorly distributed and limited in scope, and that such courses as are available are not required of the student.[10] Other publications on the subject, including some 25 books and pamphlets contained in a newly compiled Kit on Intergroup Education prepared jointly by the American Teachers Association and the National Education Association, in cooperation with the United States Office of Education, support the strong conviction of educators that prior preparation of teachers and prior indoctrination of the public are essential prerequisites to effective integration of different racial groups.[11]

A second major consideration in effecting integration of the dual school system in the District of Columbia is the matter of teacher replacements and promotions. In the District of Columbia Teachers Salary Act of 1945 (59 Stat. 488, approved July 21, 1945) separate boards of examiners and separate chief examiners for the white and colored schools were provided for, and subsequent enactments (District of Columbia Teachers Salary Act of 1947 [12] and an amendment thereto in 1951 [13]) repeated and extended such provision. Pursuant to these Acts of Congress, rules were promulgated by the Board of Education of the District of Columbia under which separate examinations for teachers have been conducted and separate eligible lists compiled. There is no feasible way to combine the two lists, eligibles on which have, in some instances, preferential employment rights under the rules for as long as three years.[14] Such rules have the force and effect of law. U. S. ex rel. Denny v. Callahan, 54 App. D. C. 61, 294 Fed. 992. Without corrective legislation, the conflict of rights of the eligibles on the two lists would probably lead to extended litigation and, indeed, necessary appointments of teachers could not be accomplished. Time within which such legislation can be obtained is not readily predictable.

From the foregoing it is clear that question 4(a) propounded by the Court must be answered in the negative.

II

Question 4(b)—In the Event That Separate Schools for White and Negro Children are Declared Unconstitutional, the Breadth of the Court's Equity Powers and the Factual Situation in the District Permits, But Does Not Necessarily Require, An Effective Gradual Adjustment to be Brought About

Since there is no allegation of inequality of facilities in the case involving public schools in the District of Columbia, there can be no doubt, with reference to the second part of question number four propounded by the Court, that the Court, if it finds the dual school system to be unconstitutional, may, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from the existing segregated to an integrated system. The attention of the Court is directed to the statement made on page 48 of the Brief for Petitioners on Reargument that:

> "Here there is no question of equality of facilities."

This fact is repeated in the "Conclusion" on page 96 of petitioners' latest brief:

> "Here no question of equality of facilities is in issue."

From Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629, 635, counsel for petitioners quote the statement, "It is fundamental that these cases concern rights which are personal and present." They also cite Sipuel v. Board of Regents, 332 U. S. 631, 633; Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337, 352;

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Farrington v. Tokushige, 273 U. S. 284; Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U. S. 510 and Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U. S. 390, to support the proposition that, if the dual school system in the District of Columbia is struck down as unconstitutional, the resulting change to a single system must be immediate. The Sweatt case, however, and all of the other cases that they cite were written against a background of either complete denial of educational opportunity or of such inferior facilities therefor as to amount to complete denial. Such is not the case in the District of Columbia. Indeed, on pages 93 and 95 of their Brief on Reargument counsel for petitioners "concede that there may well be difficulties and delays of a purely administrative nature involved in bringing about desegregation", and "concede the possibility of delay until the next school year by reason of administrative requirements." These concessions refute the theory of petitioners that a declaration of unconstitutionality requires immediate transition from the dual to a single school system. In effect they are saying, "We are being educated in separate schools, as to which we make no contention that there is not equality of facilities, but mere separation from our white brethren is unconstitutional and, although you may deny us those constitutional rights for a short time (which we think is only until the next school term) you may not deny them for a period beyond that which we think is a proper one."

In concluding that the Court may permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about, counsel for respondents do not suggest that a gradual adjustment would be desirable or, indeed, necessary. In the judgment of experts, integration might be accomplished in certain areas of the District before it is ordered in others if, as may possibly be the case, some teachers have been properly prepared to handle integration and others have not been properly instructed. In such a case, the integration of children in some schools may afford what may be termed "workshops" for the even better indoctrination of teachers yet to be instructed on the subject. Unless, however, competent authority should reach such a conclusion, respondents counsel conceive of no reason for "gradual adjustment" from a dual to a single unsegregated system if the former is unconstitutional.

The right of the Court, in exercising its equity power, to formulate decrees which take "into mind the complexity of the situation in all of its aspects and [give] weight to the many-sided considerations which must control * * *"[15] is well established. As was said in United States v. Morgan, 307 U. S. 183, 194, "It is familiar doctrine that the extent to which a court of equity may grant or withhold its aid and the manner of moulding its remedies may be affected by the public interest involved."

Again in Virginian Railway Co. v. System Federation, Etc., 300 U. S. 515, 552, Mr. Justice Stone, speaking for the Court, said:

> "Courts of equity may, and frequently do, go much farther both to give and withhold relief in furtherance of the public interest than they are accustomed to go when only private interests are involved."

The same Justice, in a later case (Securities & Exchange Commission v. United States Realty Company, 310 U. S. 434, 455) expressed an even more far-reaching doctrine, as follows:

> "A court of equity may in its descretion in the exercise of the jurisdiction committed to it grant or deny relief upon performance of a condition which will safeguard the public interest. It may in the public interest, even withhold relief altogether, and it would seem that it is bound to stay

BLEED THROUGH

its hand in the public interest when it reasonably appears that private right will not suffer.'' (Emphasis supplied.)

No one will gainsay that, if integration is ordered, its perfection without conflict or difficulty and with an attitude of acceptance by all concerned is in the public interest. Where, as in the District of Columbia, there is a complete system of public schools for Negroes and where "there is no question of equality of facilities", "it would seem that (the Court) is bound to stay its hand in the public interest (for) it reasonably appears that private right will not suffer." Certainly private right will not suffer for the reasonable length of time that may be required to obtain from Congress necessary legislation and appropriations, to make necessary administrative arrangements and to properly indoctrinate teachers and the public to a radical change in the local educational system.

Again counsel for respondents make the point that they do not advocate and see no need for a protracted extension of the time for integration of the schools of the District if the same should be ordered. They do, however, firmly believe that an adequate time is necessary and advisable to accomplish the change in the manner in which acknowledged leaders in education believe that such a change should properly be accomplished.

III

Question 5—In The Event That Separate Schools for White and Negro Children Are Declared Unconstitutional, Without the Formulation of a Detailed Decree, and Without the Appointment of a Special Master, the Court Should Remand the Cases to the District Courts With Directions to Integrate Schools as Expeditiously as Conditions Warrant

For convenience, question number five propounded by the Court, although divided into four parts, will be answered as one.

Counsel for respondents are not in disagreement with the basic position taken by petitioners on pages 94-96 of their Brief on Reargument in answer to the several parts of the fifth question from the Court. It is not believed that, in the event the dual school system in the District of Columbia should be declared unconstitutional, this Court should formulate a detailed decree, and, accordingly, it follows that there is no necessity for the Court to appoint a special master to hear evidence with a view to recommending the terms for a detailed decree. It, of course, is not known to counsel for respondents whether the Court will hold unconstitutional the dual school systems involved in all of the cases now before it. It is assumed, on the basis of authorities and arguments set forth in Section III of the Brief For Respondents filed herein in 1952 (pp. 16-31, and particularly p. 30), that, since the Fifth Amendment, which applies to the District of Columbia, contains no "equal protection" clause as does the 14th Amendment, which applies to the States, unconstitutionality cannot be found here unless it is also decreed in the State cases. A holding by the Court of unconstitutionality of separate systems of schools for white and Negro children would present vast and varying problems in the five jurisdictions involved. Accordingly, the framing of detailed decrees would be a task which, frankly, it is not believed the Supreme Court is equipped to work out unless it should have testimony on the needs in each of the five jurisdictions through the medium of a Court appointed special master.

But if the Court should decree the separate school systems in the five jurisdictions before it to be unconstitutional, it is obvious that the whole question of the separation of the races in public school education would be settled throughout the United States—indeed, such a ruling might well affect the validity of all laws providing for separate but equal treatment of different races in areas other than that of public education. There is, therefore, every reason to believe that the problem of adjustment, in the event of such a ruling, would be of no less magnitude in the thirteen remaining jurisdictions in which there is separation in the schools by races than in the five which are now before the Court. Each such jurisdiction would be obliged to work out the details of adjustment through legislation, administrative changes, education of teachers, education of the public, etc.

In other words, eighteen separate political subdivisions of the United States would be obliged to make revolutionary changes in what has been described as "a way of life". The practical impossibility of framing detailed decrees to effect such vast changes in so many places is at once apparent.

Obviously, the forum for the preparation and direction of the transformation, if such a change is to be made, is the district court in each jurisdiction. Here there are readily available facilities and rules for the taking of testimony, for informal conferences for the working out of intimate details that may be necessary—indeed, for the judicial knowledge of local conditions so essential to effect adjustments in such a major and, at the same time, sensitive area.

The time that may be necessary to accomplish complete integration of the school system in the District of Columbia cannot here be foretold. Perhaps by cooperation between the leaders of Congress and local authorities, both administrative and judicial, the changeover could be effected in a short time. The soundest suggestion that counsel for respondents can make to the Court concerning the nature of the order, if unconstutionality is to be decreed, is that the Court make recognition of the necessity for proper preparation and changes which appear essential to perfect integration in all jurisdictions and remand the cases to the respective district courts with instructions for such courts to prepare decrees directing the immediate commencement of such preperation, with periodic investigation by the district courts of the progress thereof, with direction that, in accordance with the principle of unconstitutionality of separation of races in schools, integration be commenced at the earliest possible date, and that complete integration be accomplished by a definite future date, not to exceed in any jurisdiction more than a maximum period of time.

Summary of Position of Respondents

Counsel are aware of the expressed policy of the President of the United States to use the power of his office to terminate all forms of segregation in the Nation's Capital and are cognizant of steps taken by the Government of the District of Columbia in furtherance of that declared purpose of the President.

Because the subject of segregation has many facets, particularly in the light of governmental pronouncements and actions in the realm of improvement of race relations generally and in order to avoid any misconception concerning the basis of the arguments which have been advanced on behalf of respondents, it is deemed advisable to set forth below a clear and concise statement with reference thereto.

No attempt is made to debate the rightness or wrongness of the separation of children by races in the schools of the District of Columbia. For the reason that it is not believed that the sociological issue is involved, no poll has been taken of the individual respondents as to their views on that issue. From public utterances, counsel for respondents believe that, while some may favor a continuance of the dual school system in the District of Columbia, others of the respondents are strongly of the view that the time for integration has arrived.

As forcefully as the plain statement thereof can make it, counsel for respondents state to the Court that the position they take and have taken in argument and in the Brief for Respondents filed at the October Term 1952, is a strictly legal position which they, as officers of the Court, feel duty-bound to present because of their belief in its soundness.

Vernon E. West, Esq.
Corporation Counsel, D. C.

Dear Mr. West:

In reply to the inquiry from your office, we advise that our department conducted a twelve-session course in intergroup relations which terminated November 19, 1953.

This training program, organized by a staff committee, was given to 36 of our workers by the group-discussion technique, recognized as one of the more effective methods of inculcating this subject. The number was limited to 36 because it was felt that this was the maximum number that could be properly handled in one class by one instructor. In practice, this is perhaps too large a group for one teacher.

We believe that the twelve 2-hour sessions held during the six-week period did much to strengthen our workers' ability to administer an integrated program on our open units. The modification of attitudes which have prevailed over a long period of time usually requires a continuing program of training. In addition there must be a willingness on the part of our personnel to adapt themselves to the policies of the department. We believe the participants were receptive to the training and profited from it. Their training will continue on an informal basis through staff meetings, distribution of appropriate literature and discussions.

There were and are problems connected with the offering of such training to our personnel. Among these are financing, the time element, the matter of transportation, and the necessity of obtaining qualified experts to give the course. The first of these problems was solved for us through the generosity of eight organizations who paid the necessary expenses. These organizations were the National Conference of Christians and Jews, the Jewish Community Council of Greater Washington, the American Friends Service Committee, the Washington Interracial Workshop, the Washington Federation of Churches, the Catholic Interracial Council, the Washington Urban League and the Unitarian Fellowship for Social Justice.

BLEED THROUGH

To give the courses, the personnel had, of course, to be assembled in one place, and two alternatives were presented so far as time is concerned. Workers must either give their own time, or the employees must be relieved from the performance of their regular duties to take the courses in regular working hours. We adopted the latter.

So far as instructors are concerned, some six or eight qualified persons were located locally, but at least half-a-dozen experts in the field were imported to conduct parts of the program in this six-week course just completed.

We might mention that the Recreation Department has no funds with which to repeat the program on the same scale for other personnel of the Department to whom we would very much like to extend the training. For any future training, we shall attempt to recruit leadership from within our own organization or endeavor to obtain outside experts on a volunteer basis.

It is our view that the success of the non-segregated use of play areas is dependent to a large extent on the proper training of recreation directors.

We trust that this gives to you the information that you desire regarding our intergroup relations program.

Sincerely yours,

/s/ Milo F. Christiansen

11. Following the approval by the Board of Education of the list of successful candidates in any examination, the respective boards of examiners shall prepare and submit to the Board of Education for record an eligible list consisting of the names of all persons who have successfully passed examinations, in which eligible lists are required, for the same position or in the same subject or subjects, and whose eligiblity has not expired. The names of the successful candidates shall be arranged in order of rank in accordance with the total mark of each candidate, irrespective of the date of examination. The names of such persons thus arranged shall constitute an eligible list from which appointments shall be made in the manner provided in these rules.

12. The Board of Education may, on the recommendation of the superintendent of schools, remove from said eligible list the name of any person for failure to do satisfactory work as a substitute or temporary teacher, or for other sufficient cause.

15. The respective boards of examiners shall determine the amount of credit experience to which teachers, officers, or other employees are entitled under the provisions of the Retirement Act.

16. The respective boards of examiners shall have control over and jurisdiction in all matters pertaining to the examinations required by law, or by the rules or orders of the Board of Education.

Brief for Respondents on Formulation of Decree

ARGUMENT

In the decision of this case on May 17, 1954 the Court concluded its opinion as follows:

> "For the reasons set out in Brown v. Board of Education, this case will be restored to the docket for reargument on questions 4 and 5 previously propounded by the Court. 345 U. S. 972."

In Brown v. Board of Education, the Court, on the same day, decided several State cases argued and reargued jointly with this case. Therein the Court also ordered restoration of those cases to the docket for the same purpose. In the Brown case the Court observed: "On reargument, the consideration of appropriate relief was necessarily subordinated to the primary question * * *. Because there are class actions, because of the wide applicability of this decision, and because of the great variety of local conditions, the formulation of decrees in these cases presents problems of considerable complexity".

While, admittedly, the decision of this case presented to the respondents problems of considerable complexity, they have promulgated and put into effect in the public school system of the District of Columbia measures to accomplish education of pupils without regard to race in accordance with the decision of the Court.

Set forth in the appendix to this brief are the following:

Exhibit 1—Report, dated May 25, 1954, containing a declaration of policy concerning the question of integration in the public schools (approved by the Board of Education, May 25, 1954).

Exhibit 2—Report of the Superintendent of Schools to the Board of Education, dated May 25, 1954, outlining plans for the desegregation of all schools (approved by the Board of Education, June 2, 1954).

Exhibit 3—Report of the Superintendent of Schools to the Board of Education, dated June 23, 1954, setting forth a schedule of dates for completion of the program of desegregation of the public schools of the District of Columbia (approved by the Board of Education, June 23, 1954).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Exhibit 4—Action of Board suspending paragraph 4 of its declaration policy.

Exhibit 5—Affidavit of the Superintendent of Schools setting forth progress of the program of integration of the public schools.

Exhibit 6—Affidavit of the President of the Board of Education concerning Board action and views on integration.

It will be seen from the foregoing exhibits that positive steps have been taken and are well under way for complete desegregation of pupils in the public schools of the District of Columbia, and that, according to the schedule approved by the respondents, the entire program will have been completed by September 1, 1955, i.e., before the beginning of the next full school year.

While Exhibit 6 shows that there was wide divergence of opinion among the respondent members of the Board of Education concerning the method and the timing of the program of desegregation and that some of the Board members are still not satisfied therewith, it further shows that the Statement of Principles, the General Plan and the Time Schedule were all approved by a majority of the Board. Except for a brief and mild expression of emotions in four or five schools above the elementary level, the transition has proceeded without incident.

Believing that their legal position on the principal question had been fully set forth in the original brief filed herein, counsel for respondents confined themselves in their Brief On Reargument to answers to questions 4 and 5 propounded by the Court in its order of June 8, 1953. Therein counsel set forth their position that a declaration of unconstitutionality of public schools does not require immediate transition to an integrated school system and recommended that this and other cases pending before the Court be remanded to the courts of original jurisdiction with instructions for such courts to order the commencement of integration at the earliest praticable date, with complete integration to be accomplished by a definite future date to be fixed by this Court, and with progress toward completion of the program to be periodically investigated by the lower courts.

Counsel for respondents adhere to the legal position set forth in their Brief on Reargument.

Unless, therefore, the Court disagrees with the first premise, i.e., that the unconstitutionality of segregated schools does not require an immediate transition to an integrated system, it is submitted that no directive of compliance with the decision of May 17th is necessary, because the time schedule which respondents have put into operation for the accomplishment of complete integration of the schools in the District of Columbia is as short as can reasonably be devised to establish, in orderly fashion, a school system which complies with the decision.

If the Court agrees with the last premise, then, it is submitted, the entire matter, so far as the District of Columbia school system is concerned, is, for all practical purposes, moot—at least upon the completion of the time schedule in the very near future the matter will be completely moot, and counsel for respondents submit to the Court that there will be no necessity for even the remand of this case to the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

CONCLUSION

The basic legal position of counsel for respondents was fully set forth in their brief on reargument and nothing need be added thereto. Herein there is fully set forth a report of progress towards complete compliance with the decision of this Court which demonstrates that within less than ten (10) months from the date of final argument the controversy so far as the District of Columbia is concerned will be completely moot. Under the circumstances, it is submitted that no directive from the Court is necessary for compliance with its ruling.

BLEED THROUGH

To the Board of Education
of the District of Columbia

Ladies and Gentlemen:

The Board of Education at its meeting held May 19, 1954, through its President, appointed the undersigned Board members as a Special Committee for the purpose of drafting principles for presentation to the Board at its special meeting on May 25, 1954, on the question of integration in the public schools.

This Special Committee held a meeting on May 22, 1954, in the Board Room of the Franklin Administration Building. Those present were the entire Special Committee, Colonel West A. Hamilton, Dr. Margaret Just Butcher and Miss Mary H. Parker, members of the Board of Education, the Superintendent of Schools and the Secretary of the Board.

The Special Committee voted unanimously to approve the following declaration of policy:

In the light of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Bolling v. Sharpe, the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, believing it to be in the best interest of all citizens of the community of Washington, and necessary to the effective administration of an integrated system within the public schools, hereby adopts the following declaration of policy:

1. Appointments, transfers, preferments, promotions, ratings, or any other matters respecting the officers and employees of the Board shall be predicated solely upon merit and not upon race or color.
2. No pupil of the public schools shall be favored or discriminated against in any matter or in any manner respecting his or her relationship to the schools of the District of Columbia by reason of race or color.
3. Attendance of pupils residing within school boundaries, hereafter to be established, shall not be permitted at schools located beyond such boundaries, except for the most necessitous reasons or for the public convenience, and in no event for reasons related to the racial character of the school within the boundaries in which the pupil resides.
4. The Board believes that no record should be kept or maintained in respect to any pupil not enrolled in a public school on or prior to June 17, 1954, or in respect to any officer or employee not employed within the system on or prior to that date in which information is solicited or recorded relating to the color or race of any such person.

5. That the maximum efficient use shall be made of all physical facilities without regard to race or color.

In support of the foregoing principles, which are believed to be cardinal, the Board will not hesitate to use its full powers. It is pledged to a complete and wholehearted pursuit of these objectives.

We affirm our intention to secure the right of every child, within his own capacity, to the full, equal and impartial use of all school facilities, and the right of all qualified teachers to teach where needed within the school system. And, finally, we ask the aid, cooperation and goodwill of all citizens and the help of the Almighty in holding to our stated purposes.

The Special Committee recommends the approval by the Board of the above stated declaration of policy.

Respectfully submitted,

WALTER N. TOBRINER, Chairman

EXHIBIT 2

Franklin Administration Building
Thirteenth and K Streets, NW.
Washington 5, D. C.

May 25, 1954

To the Board of Education
of the District of Columbia

Ladies and Gentlemen:

On Monday, May 17, 1954, the Supreme Court of the United States issued two opinions, one having to do with segregation in public schools in Kansas, South Carolina, Virginia, and Delaware, and the other with segregated schools in the District of Columbia. The first opinion declared that "such segregation is a denial of the equal protection of the laws" and the second opinion stated:

> 'In view of our decision that the Constitution prohibits the states from maintaining racially segregated public schools, it would be unthinkable that the same Constitution would impose a lesser duty on the Federal Government. We hold that racial segregation in the public schools of the District of Columbia is a denial of the due process of law guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution.'

The latter opinion also restored to the docket of the Court the case of Brown v. the Board of Education for further argument next fall on certain aspects of the suit. This opinion placed upon the Board of Education and the Superintendent of Schools the responsibility for accomplishing the complete de-segregation of all public schools in the District of Columbia.

The transition from a segregated to a de-segregated type of school organization requires definite administrative decisions and practices. To accomplish the transition in Washington as rapidly and effectively as possible, basic principles need to be established which will govern all administrative procedures necessary in complying with the opinion of the Court. The Superintendent and his staff state as a basic premise that the schools will hereafter operate as a single system and that no reference will be made in any way to racial differences among its pupils or its employees.

The following general principles are calculated to make the best use of the total resources of the school system in plant and personnel, to serve the best interest of all the pupils, and to promote the general welfare of the community. To implement these principles, administrative attention must be directed toward steps which will assure the distribution of pupils and the assignment of employed personnel smoothly and expeditiously. These general principles are presented to the Board of Education for its consideration.

To the Board of Education
of the District of Columbia—2

May 25, 1954

1. Complete de-segregation of all schools is to be accomplished with least possible delay.

   De-segregation by grades or by levels would delay the process and would create administrative problems arising from confusion and inconsistencies.

2. New boundaries are to be established for each school.

   Definite boundaries will be established for each school to make the optimum use of the school by the pupils living in its immediate area.

   In sections of the city where schools are located very close to each other it will be impossible to set up separate boundaries for each school. In such instances, therefore, the boundaries will be for groups of schools rather than for individual schools.

   When the new boundaries have been established and the plan is in operation, adherence to the boundary limitations must be definite and without exception.

This does not mean, however, that there will be any change in the present practice of adjustments of any school boundaries by the Superintendent wherever changes in school population make such action necessary. These boundary readjustments during the period of transition to a de-segregated system will probably be more frequent than they are at present.

3. Appointments and promotions of all school personnel are to be made on a merit system only and assignment will be in accord with the needs of the service.

   The tenure rights of individuals as to salary level and rank will be maintained.

   The duties of some officers will necessarily be changed.

4. The transition to a de-segregated system is to be accomplished by natural and orderly means.

   Artificial and immediate reassignments of large numbers of pupils, teachers, and officers would be disruptive and will be avoided.

SCHOOL BOUNDARIES AND DISTRIBUTION OF PUPILS

One very significant aspect of the process of de-segregation is that concerned with the distribution of pupils among the various schools. It is evident that the reasonable and proper criteria for this distribution are:

1. the optimum use of all school buildings, and
2. the optimum accessibility of school buildings to the residences of pupils.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

These criteria necessarily require the establishment of definite zones to be served by each school or group of schools. The teachers colleges and the vocational and technical high schools because they are specialized in nature will continue to be city-wide in their services. In establishing zones for the optimam use of all school buildings, the objective will be to assign to each given school or group of schools an area calculated to give each building its fair share of the total pupil load in relation to its capacity.

Although it will not be possible to avoid all traffic hazards or to assure convenient public transportation in every case in considering the accessibility of a school account will be taken of these factors as well as the factor of distance to be travelled by the pupils.

To facilitate the establishment of proper boundaries for all school buildings on a de-segregated basis, the residence cards for all pupils now in the Washington public schools have been set up on the IBM accounting machines according to city blocks, by grade levels, and by schools now attended. In addition thereto each building principal is preparing a spot map to indicate the places of residence of all his pupils. The officers charged with the responsibility of establishing the boundaries will then be able to determine the number of pupils now enrolled in the schools who live in any given city block. They will also know the grade level and the school last attended by each pupil. The compilation of these data will assist in the establishment of the boundary limitations.

In order to provide stability, continuity, and security in the educational experiences of pupils during the transition period, it is agreed that it will be educationally sound to permit pupils at present enrolled in any school to continue in that school even though they are not living within the new boundaries. By this means immediate displacement of unnecessarily large numbers of pupils will be avoided. Progressively with the establishment of new boundaries all children will attend the schools serving the areas in which they live.

The following procedures will be needed to carry out this plan:

1. Fixed zones are to be established for each elementary, junior high and senior high school to insure balanced use of school facilities.

2. All pupils new to the school system or to a particular school level will be assigned to the schools designated to serve the zones in which they live.

To the Board of Education
of the District of Columbia—4

May 25, 1954

3. All pupils at present enrolled in a given school may remain until graduation provided the school is not overcrowded and provided the priority rights of pupils within the new boundaries of the school are not denied. If they prefer they may transfer to the school serving the zone in which they live. Elementary school pupils who change residence will be transferred to the school assigned to the area of the new residence.

4. Transfers from one school to another will be required when necessary to relieve overcrowded conditions.

In order to demonstrate how these proceedures will operate, the Superintendent suggests that the cases of the boundaries of two hypothetical schools (elementary, junior high or senior high) be considered: School "A", formerly a Division 1 school, and School "B", formerly a Division 2 school, serving areas within their new boundaries on a desegregated basis, the two areas being contiguous.

By the application of the foregoing procedures what children must attend and what children may attend School "A"?

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

These must attend School "A"

1. All children living within the new boundaries who formerly attended School "A".
2. All children living within the new boundaries who are entering a school of that level for the first time.
3. All children who are newly residing in the area served by School "A".
4. Children now attending School "B" but living within the boundaries of School "A" if School "B" becomes overcrowded.

Those who may attend School "A"

1. Children now enrolled in Schol "A" whether or not their residence is within the boundaries of School "A" may continue to attend until their graduation subject to the following conditions:
   a. if School "A" becomes overcrowded, pupils previously attending School "A" who live in the area now served by School "B" or any other school will be transferred to that school.
   b. if further relief from overcrowding is necessary after all children not living in the area served by School "A" have been transferred, it will then be necessary to provide additional relief by further changing the boundaries of School "A".

To the Board of Education
of the District of Columbia—5

May 25, 1954

2. Any child living in the area of School "A" may attend that school if he so desires even though he may now be enrolled in School "B" or in some other school.

It should be noted that all children living within the boundaries of any given school will have first priority for attending that school.

These same regulations will apply to School "B", and to all other elementary, junior high or senior high schools in the city except those which are city-wide in their services.

The ultimate distribution of pupils strictly in accordance with established zones will be accomplished through the provisions of the principle that all pupils entering the elementary, junior high, or senior high schools for the first time shall be assigned to the schools designated to serve the zones of their residences. This applies equally to pupils entering the first grade, pupils promoted to junior high or senior high schools, pupils entering the Washington Public Schools for the first time, and pupils transferring from one area of the city to another.

Finally, authority for the placement of all pupils must be vested in the Superintendent of Schools and his staff, who will administer the plan within the framework of the policies enunciated by the Board of Education.

ASSIGNMENT OF EDUCATIONAL EMPLOYEES

A second major aspect of the process of de-segregation is that dealing with the distribution of the teachers, including librarians and counselors. The following procedures are recommended to govern the assignment of these employees. Here again it is felt that once policies are established through formal action of the Board of Education the school administration shall then be vested with final authority for determining the placement of school employees.

1. Teachers now in service.

   In general these employees will remain in their present assignments subject to the following conditions.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

b. When vacancies occur or when there is need for additional teachers in a given school, assignments to that school will be determined in accordance with the best use of available personnel. As is true at present, a controlling consideration in the placement of personnel will be the general fitness and adaptability of an individual for a particular situation.

c. Requests of teachers for transfers will be honored as at present if the transfers are in accordance with the needs of the overall school organization.

2. Appointment and placement of teachers new to the service.

a. All appointments of teachers will be made from rated lists resulting from examinations to be held by a single Board of Examiners.

b. All assignments of new personnel will be in accordance with the needs of the service.

Another important aspect in the de-segregation process is the assignment of field officers. Since most of them are specialists in their field it is essential that consideration be given their training and experience.

1. Principals and Assistant Principals now in service.

The procedure for the assignment of assistant principals and principals now in the service will be the same as that prescribed for teachers.

2. Directors, Assistant Directors, Heads of Departments, and other field officers.

   Directors, assistant directors, and heads of departments, who at present serve the system on a divisional basis will be assigned to duties in the same fields of work on a city-wide basis. The duties of most of these positions fall logically into large areas, such as administration, supervision and improvement of instruction, and curriculum revision. Each of these officers will be assigned to some such area in his field on a city-wide basis and will serve all levels of the system.

3. Personnel in special departments and officers now operating on a divisional basis will be reassigned on a city-wide basis.

4. Newly appointed officers in these groups will be selected according to merit under the existing procedures for the selection and promotion of persons for officer positions, but on a system-wide basis.

The Superintendent is not yet prepared to make recommendations as to any formal changes in the functions of the officers on his staff. The work involved in accomplishing desegregation in so large a school system will require the closely-knit and joint efforts of all these officers for a considerable period of time. They have been engaged in working out the detailed preparation of this plan and it will require their continued cooperative efforts in its inauguration. The responsibilities and duties of such officers as the Assistant to the Superintendent in charge of Business Administration, the Associate Superintendent in charge of Buildings and Grounds, and the Associate Superintendent in charge of Personnel are already city-wide in scope. The work which is at present the responsibility of the officers in charge of instruction and school administration and of educational research will in no wise be lessened by the change in the school system. It is the plan of the Superintendent to assign these officers eventually to duties that will be broadened and on a system-wide basis and which will provide opportunity for the initiation of new services and the development of others not at present sufficiently emphasized. These reassignments will result in considerably improved supervisory and administrative practices in the classrooms of all levels.

BLEED THROUGH

PROPOSED SCHEDULE

To begin the implimentation of the plan to de-segregate the public schools of the District of Columbia, the Superintendent proposes the following tentative schedule:

By September, 1954—

Completion by the building principals and their supervisory officers of the establishment of new boundaries for all schools except those that will continue to function on a city-wide basis.

Relief of present urgent situations in:

1. Elementary Schools

   a. To relieve overcrowding transfer a sufficient number of pupils:

      from the Slowe and Noyes Schools to the Woodridge, Langdon, and Burroughs Schools

      from the Bruce, Monroe, and Park View Schools to the Raymond, Petworth, Barnard, and Rudolph Schools

      from the Madison, Maury, and Lovejoy Schools to the Kingsman, Edmonds, and Blair Schools

from the Taylor, Hayes and Ludlow Schools to the Wheatley School

To the Board of Education
of the District of Columbia—8

May 25, 1954

from the Bryan and the Payne Schools to the Buchanan School.

from the River Terrace School to the Benning School.

b. To vacate the Military Road School, no longer needed for classrom purposes, transfer the pupils from that school to the Brightwood School.

2. Junior High Schools

a. To alleviate overcrowding transfer pupils:

from the Randall Junior High School to the Jefferson Junior High School

from the Kelly Miller Junior High School to the Sousa Junior High School.

NOTE: These transfers of elementary and junior high school pupils are proposed by the Superintendent because of almost emergency situations and in his opinion are deserving of approval at this time at first steps in the complete de-segregation process. He feels that no cases beyond these should be considered at this time.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

3. Senior High Schools

Begin the merging of the McKinley and Armstrong Technical High Schools by transferring to McKinley students in such courses as can be accommodated in the present classroom and shop facilities.

NOTE: The complete merger of these two schools will depend upon appropriation of necessary funds for construction and moving and purchase of equipment.

4. Teachers Colleges

While there is no urgent situation in the college enrollments, it is proposed that both Wilson and Miner Teachers College be opened to qualified students regardless of race and that the two institutions plan special course offerings so that students in either one will be able to take advantage of such offerings in the other. A complete merging of the colleges cannot be accomplished at this time since there is not at present any building available which can accommodate so large an institution.

Attention is called to the fact that the suggestions proposed above providing for de-segregation in certain areas of the school system are in advance of any present requirement of the Supreme Court Opinion.

After the opening of the schools in September, the Superintendent will continue as rapidy as possible with the whole program, taking into consideration the necessary steps, the most important of which are listed below:

1. Assigning pupils to schools on basis of new boundaries.
2. Preparing Board Orders for changed assignments of teachers and officers where necessary.
3. Carrying on programs of in-service training in intercultural relationships for all employees.
4. Conducting examinations based on amended legislation.
5. Establishing new eligible lists for teacher appointments.
6. Replanning city-wide student activities, such as sports, cadets, student government, and musical activities.
7. Relocating all field officers now occupying space which will be required for classroom use.
8. Making adjustments in allotments for postage, stores—clerks, and evening schools.
9. Moving furniture and classroom equipment.
10. Arranging for adjustments in the delivery of classroom supplies and textbooks to meet changed school enrollments.
11. Recommending to the Board necessary changes in its rules.

If the Board approves the Superintendent's plan and if there are no such setbacks as the failure to secure such legislative changes as the Corporation Counsel deems necessary or to secure funds that may be necessary to accomplish the physical changes in schools and in the redistribution of classroom equipment and supplies, the Superintendent feels that he can complete the changeover to a de-segregated system by September, 1955.

BLEED THROUGH

To the Board of Education
of the District of Columbia—10

May 25, 1954

It is the belief of the Superintendent that he cannot in September go beyond the steps outlined in this report because of the lack of sufficient time before the close of school in June as the presence of pupils, teachers and officers is essential to the carrying out of these plans. The official school calendar specifies June 17, as the last day for pupils; June 18, as the last day for teachers; and July 1 through August 31, as the summer vacation period for field officers. The field officers are, of course, subject to call during this vacation period if their services are needed.

The Superintendent submits this report for the consideration of the Board and recommends its approval. For the convenience of the Board he recapitulates below the specific recommendations that will require Board approval before he can begin the administrative steps looking to the actual de-segregation of the public schools of the District of Columbia:

1. As a basic premise, that the public schools operate hereafter as a single system without reference of any kind to or consideration of racial differences among its pupils or its employees.

2. That complete de-segregation be accomplished with the least possible delay according to the suggested schedule steps.

3. That the transition to a de-segregated system be made by natural and orderly means.

4. That new boundaries be established for each school to provide the optimum use of all buildings and the optimum accessibility of schools to the places of residence of pupils.

5. That the assignments of pupils to schools be made on the basis of the steps outlined in the section, "School Boundaries and Distribution of Pupils," and according to the calendar established in the schedule.

6. That all appointments, promotions, and assignments of school personnel be made on the basis of merit only and in accordance with the needs of the service.

7. That the assignments of teachers, librarians, counselors, and field officers be made according to the policies outlined in the section, 'Assignment of Educational Employees.'

8. That members of the Superintendent's immediate staff continue in their present assignments until the whole process of de-segregation has proceeded sufficiently far to enable the Superintendent to present his plan for the reorganization of his staff including such changed duties as he then finds expedient.

9. That a schedule be set up providing by September, 1954, for the establishment of new boundaries for all schools; the closing of the Military Road School; the relief of pupil-overcrowding in those elementary schools and junior high school listed in the schedule on pages 7 and 8; the beginning of the merging of the McKinley and Armstrong Technical High Schools; the opening of both Teachers Colleges on a de-segregated basis; and by September, 1955, the complete de-segregation of all schools in the system.

The Superintendent further recommends that he be authorized to prepare an estimate of funds to be sought through appropriation covering such expenses as will be incurred in the de-segregation process that can not be met from funds already appropriated.

The Superintendent is submitting a separate report covering amendments to existing legislation which he considers necessary to the de-segregation program.

All necessary data concerning new boundaries to be furnished school principals and press to insure publicity reaching all school personnel and patrons.

July 1 Superintendent to submit recommendations for merging of all lists of persons eligible for appointment to all teacherships on all levels.

September 1* Use of new boundaries on all levels for all pupils new to the public schools including kindergarten and first grade pupils entering the public schools for the first time.

September 13* Evening schools to open for operation on an integrated basis.

September 13* Transfers of selected Division 2 elementary school pupils who because of present boundaries are required to travel excessive distances where there are present Division 1 schools near their homes. This is possible as it involves a limited number of pupils and in no instance will require reorganization in a school receiving pupils or the transfer of furniture or equipment.

Any similar cases on the secondary level will be considered on an individual basis.

present schools and the numbers of those who wish to transfer to the schools serving their residence areas. On the basis of these findings he will then make such changed pupil assignments as are found feasible without forced transfers at the beginning of the new semester in February.*

January 31, 1955* Assign all junior high school graudates to senior high schools on the basis of the new boundaries.

Make such additional teacher transfers and school reorganizations as are necessary.
Effect such transfers at all levels as may produce a better balanced use of all school facilities, and at the same time be consistent with the educational program of the children themselves.

Arrange for building changes and transfers of equipment and supplies as are necessitated by the changed pupil assignments.

February to June, 1955 Complete the processing of all options not acted upon for February with the consequent pupil transfer and reassignment of teachers on September 1, 1955.

Arrange for additional transfers of furniture and equipment and textbooks and supplies, where necessary.

September 1, 1955* The Superintendent announces one further important step in the integration process which is now presented. This will involve the closing of the Cardozo High School by June, 1955, and the merging of the Wilson and Miner Teachers Colleges in the present Cardozo building in September, 1955. The rezoning of the senior high schools has revealed such an overage of seating space that Cardozo can be closed and the pupils accomodated in the remaining senior high schools, freeing the Cardozo building for college use. It is planned also at the same time to open a junior high schol unit in the same building to serve as a laboratory school for the new merged college. The Superintendent will submit a subsequent and more detailed report on this new plan.

* This step has not previously been reported to the Board.

To the Board of Education
of the District of Columbia—7

June 23, 1954

As the Superintendent studies the entire process of integration and discovers additional steps which can be taken he will advise the Board of Education.

September 1, 1955 All steps will have been taken to complete de-segregation of the public schools. Technically, de-segregation will have begun in all schools in September, 1954, since the admission of all pupils including kindergarten and first-grade pupils new to the public schools will be on the basis of the new boundaries. All senior high schools will, in addition, be further integrated by the admission of all junior high school graduates in February, 1955, on the basis of the new boundaries.

POLL OF BOARD

September 8, 1954

To the Board of Education
of the District of Columbia

Ladies and Gentlemen:

The declaration of policy on the question of integration in the Public Schools of the District of Columbia approved by the Board on May 25, 1954, contains the following statement:

> "The Board believes that no record should be kept or maintained in respect to any pupil not enrolled in a public school on or prior to June 17, 1954, or in respect to any officer or employee not employed within the system on or prior to that date in which information is solicited or recorded relating to the color or race of any such person."

As the opening of the fall school term approaches, the inquiries as to the practical effects of integration in our schools are multiplying rapidly. Thus far we have stated that under the Board's adopted policy no record can be made available of the numbers of pupils or teachers by race.

It is doubtful whether any damage would be caused by releasing these numbers during this transitional stage. It is also doubtful whether it is to the public interest to refuse to furnish such information. The School Attendance Law requires that race be recorded for every pupil and the Board will recall that the Corporation Counsel opposed the request that this legislation be amended to discontinue recording of race.

The Superintendent recommends therefore that the Board suspend the operation of the above quoted portion of its declaration of policy to authorize him to record and release data showing the effects of integration in the public schools so far as the numbers of students and teachers are concerned, the suspension of the above quoted portion of the declaration of policy of the Board as to students to remain in effect until existing legislation is repealed or new legislation is enacted to support the Board's policy and the suspension of the above quoted portion of the declaration of policy of the Board in respect to the enumeration of teachers to be in effect until further action of the Board.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ss:

Personally appeared Hobart M. Corning, who, being first duly sworn, on oath deposes and says:

I am Superintendent of Schools of the District of Columbia and one of the respondents in the above-entitled cause. After the decision of May 17, 1954 in the above matter, the Board of Education, on May 25, 1954, approved a declaration of policy concerning the question of integration in the public school system of the District. (Exhibit 1). Thereafter, by Board action on September 8, 1954, paragraph 4 of the declaration of policy was suspended because it was found to be in conflict with an Act of Congress. (Exhibit 6). On the same date that the Board of Education adopted the declaration of policy above referred to, I submitted a report containing a general plan for desegregation of the schools. (Exhibit 2). My report was approved by the Board of Education on June 2, 1954.

On June 23, 1954 I submitted to the Board of Education a report containing a schedule of dates for the various steps in the program of desegregation of the schools, (Exhibit 3), which report was approved by the Board on that same date.

Soon after the opening of schools on September 13, 1954, I found that available classroom space permitted the taking of some of the steps in the integration program scheduled for February 1, 1955, and, in accordance with general authority, given me by approval of the general integration plan, to accelerate the time schedule, such steps were taken. This acceleration will not, however, result in completion of the program prior to September 1, 1955.

AFFIDAVIT OF C. MELVIN SHARPE, PRESIDENT, BOARD OF EDUCATION

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ss:

Personally appeared C. Melvin Sharpe, who, being first duly sworn, on oath, deposes and says:

I am President of the Board of Education of the District of Columbia and one of the respondents in the above-entitled cause. The declaration of policy and the reports outlined in the affidavit of Dr. Hobart M. Corning (Exhibit 4) were considered by the Board of Education on the dates indicated therein and were approved as therein indicated.

Although there was a wide divergence of opinion amongst the members of the Board of Education concerning both the plans submitted to them by the Superintendent and the subsequently submitted time-schedule therefor, and sharp discussion took place in several of the Board meetings concerning both of these reports, said reports, as well as the "statement of principles" prepared by a committee of the Board, were adopted by Board action, and have been set into operation. There is still no unanimity of opinion among Board members that the plan submitted and the time schedule prepared by the Superintendent are the best that could be devised. The principal objection at this point, by a minority of the Board, is that the transition is too rapid. Notwithstanding this view, the program of integration of the schools has been in effect since the opening of schools for the current term on September 13, 1954—indeed, much of the preparatory work for the commencement on that date of instruction on an integrated basis was accomplished prior thereto.

Since classes started, although some of the students in four or five schools on the junior high and high school levels expressed in a comparatively orderly manner for a period of a few days their emotions against integration, the program has proceeded, and integrated classes have been operating without incident.

I. The right to be free from racial discrimination by governmental authority, guaranteed in the States under the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th Amendment, is guaranteed in the District of Columbia under the Due Process Clause of the 5th Amendment. The racial distinctions drawn by the District Board of Education are discriminatory and therefore unconstitutional 2

II. The impossibility of providing equality of educational opportunity to every child in the District of Columbia public schools within the framework of the segregated system is so plain that no remedy, short of abolition of compulsory separation by race, can prevent the inequality forbidden by the Constitution 7

III. The people of Washington are ready for and will accept integration of their public schools 9

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit

BRIEF OF
Amicus Curiae

Preliminary Statement. This case raises for the first time in this Court the issue whether the Board of Education of the District of Columbia may constitutionally exclude Negro children, solely because of their race and color, from enrollment and instruction in a public junior high school of the District of Columbia which the Board sets apart for the education exclusively of white children, and require Negro children to attend a public junior high school set apart for the education exclusively of colored children.[1]

In our amicus brief filed in one of the State cases now scheduled for argument with this case, we have indicated why we think a State cannot constitutionally do what the Board of Education is doing here. Brief of American Veterans Committee in Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, Shawnee County, Kansas, No. 8. In this brief we shall, without repeating the argument there presented, indicate why such exclusion may not constitutionally be imposed by the Board of Education in the District of Columbia.

I. The right to be free from racial discrimination by governmental authority, guaranteed in the States under the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th Amendment, is guaranteed in the District of Columbia under the Due Process Clause of the 5th Amendment. The racial distinctions drawn by the District Board of Education are discriminatory and therefore unconstitutional.

This Court has characterized the Due Process clause of the Constitution[2] as "the compendious expression for all those rights which the courts must enforce because they are basic to our free society" [Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U. S. 25, 27 (1949)]; as "a summarized constitutional guarantee of respect for those personal immunities which . . . are 'so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people

[1] The reference in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, 551 (1896) to "acts of Congress requiring separate schools for colored children in the District of Columbia" was pure dictum, intended simply to indicate that segregation on railroad cars was less "obnoxious" than segregated schools in the District "the constitutionality of which does not seem to have been questioned" (p. 551). The decisions by the Court of Appeals in Wall v. Oyster, 36 App. D. C. 50, 54 (1910), and Carr v. Corning, 86 App. D. C. 173, 182 F. (2d) 14 (1950), rested squarely on Plessy, and neither case reached this Court.

[2] The Due Process Clause of the 5th Amendment imposes upon the Federal Government the same restraints as are imposed on the States by the Due Process Clause of the 14th Amendment. Farrington v. Tokushige, 273 U. S. 284, 299 (1927); Heiner v. Donnan, 285 U. S. 312, 326 (1932); Twining v. New Jersey, 211 U. S. 78, 101 (1908).

as to be ranked as fundamental' . . . " [Rochin v. California, 342 U. S. 165, 169 (1952)].

One of these basic and fundamental rights is the right of every person to be free from discriminatory treatment by governmental power solely because of race.

This right was imbedded, by the adoption of the 14th Amendment, into our fundamental law and is part of the warp and woof of our country's basic beliefs. This Court has vindicated this right in many areas of our national life, including housing, land ownership and occupancy,[3] employment,[4] education,[5] political participation,[6] jury service,[7] transportation,[8] and many other areas. Such vindication has not been simply by implication—this Court has stated time and again that a governmental restriction based "wholly upon color" or aimed at particular racial groups "in the eye of the law is not justified" [Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 374 (1886)]; that "discriminations based on race alone are obviously . . . invidious" [Steele v. Louisville & Nashville R. Co., 323 U. S. 192, 203 (1944)]; that "racial discrimination . . . is at war with our basic concepts of a democratic society" [Smith v. Texas, 311 U. S. 128, 130 (1940)].

Still other decisions by this Court show clearly that the right to be free from governmentally imposed racism is so "basic to our free society" as to have become a right constitutionally accorded to free men under the Due Process clause of the 5th Amendment against arbitrary action by the Federal government or agencies acting under its authority. In Yu Cong Eng v. Trinidad, 271 U. S. 500, 525-527 (1926), this Court held that an arbitrary restriction directed solely against Chinese residents violated both the Due Process clause of the 5th Amendment and the Equal Protection clause of the Philippine Bill of Rights which has the same content as the Equal Protection clause of the 14th Amendment. In more recent cases, this Court, in considering the constitutionality of acts of Congress, said that "Distinctions between citizens solely because of their ancestry are by their very nature odious to a free people whose institutions are founded upon the doctrine of equality" and are therefore "immediately suspect" and "subject . . . to the most rigid scrutiny". Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U. S. 81, 100 (1943); Korematsu v. United States, 323 U. S. 214, 216 (1944). And in Hurd v. Hodge, 334 U. S. 24, 35-36 (1948), this Court ruled that a branch of the Federal Government may not do what the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th Amendment would clearly deny to a State Government. Cf. United States v. Yount, 267 Fed. 861, 863 (D., W. D. Penn. 1920).

True, the Hirabayashi and Korematsu cases did permit the Federal Government to restrict the rights of Americans of a single racial group (those of Japanese ancestry) during the period following the attack on Pearl Harbor. But those restrictions were allowed only because of the "pressing public necessity" occasioned by the sudden onslaught of the holocaust of war. More specifically, the restrictions on American residents of Japanese ancestry were there allowed solely because it was thought that loyalty to the race of the group dominant in the aggressor country might, during the period of war, be incompatible with loyalty to the United States. It was therefore said that because of "the danger of espionage and sabotage, in time of war and threatened invasion" the racial distinction there drawn was "relevant to the measures for our national defense and for the successful prosecution of the war" . . . to prevent "an invasion of our West Coast." Hirabayashi at p. 100; Korematsu at p. 223. Its "single aim was the protection of the war effort against espionage and sabotage . . . it was an espionage and sabotage measure." Ex Parte Endo, 323 U. S. 283, 300, 302 (1944). And this Court subsequently emphasized that what Hirabayashi and Korematsu sustained was "a war measure" whose racial distinctions were excused by "only the most exceptional circumstances." Oyama v. California, 332 U. S. 633, 646 (1948).

It is unnecessary here to debate the merits of the Hirabayashi-Korematsu "loyalty" test, in the light of our Constitution which abhors racism in all its manifestations. In this case no "pressing public necessity" to safeguard our country against foreign aggression, espionage or sabotage is asserted to justify separation of white and colored children in the public schools of the District of Columbia. Nor does the District rely even on the overworked assumption of "race conflict". No such danger brews when white and colored children sit next to each other in street cars, swim in the same pools, eat in the same restaurants, picnic informally in the same parks, shop in the same stores, or worship in the same churches. It is entirely clear that permitting these children, who are subject to the laws of the community and the disciplines of parental and school authority, to attend the same public school will not produce either an over-riding public danger within the meaning of the Hirabayashi-Korematsu exception to the general doctrine that the Federal government may not validly impose restrictions based solely on race, or any other kind of real public danger. See Part III of this Brief.

Indeed, the District neither asserts that public school segregation has a reasonable relationship to the legitimate objectives of public education, nor does it furnish any justification whatsoever for that segregation. It relies simply on the "separate but equal" doctrine of Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537 (1896), implicitly recognizing that racial discrimination forbidden by the 14th Amendment is also forbidden by the 5th Amendment. But as we show in our Brief in Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka (No. 8, this Term), the "separate but equal" doctrine is not a valid constitutional basis upon which a State may compel white and colored children to go to separate public elementary schools, solely because of their race, and thereby impose on them a racial discrimination forbidden by the 14th Amendment.[9] The Plessy doctrine is an equally invalid justification for the same action by the District of Columbia Board of Education which violates the Constitutional guarantee against racial discrimination implicit in the present content of the Due Process Clause of the 5th Amendment.

[9] The Appellees in the South Carolina case (No. 101, Brief, p. 15) and in the Virginia case (No. 191, Brief, p. 12-13), which are being argued with this case, have suggested, largely on the basis of an intimation in Carr v. Corning, 86 App. D. C. 173, 177, 182 F. (2d) 14, 18 (1950), that the 39th Congress, which proposed the 14th Amendment, implicitly interpreted it to permit compulsory segregation of white and colored children in public schools. They say this because the 39th Congress enacted two acts for the benefit of the then existing schools for colored children. One of these, the act of July 23, 1866 (14 Stat. 216), was intended to clarify that the apportionment of tax funds between the then existing schools for white children and schools for colored children, an apportionment required under a previous statute (act of June 25, 1864, 13 Stat. 187), was to be made by the cities of Georgetown and Washington as well as by the County of Washington. The other, the act of July 28, 1866 (14 Stat. 343), authorized the donation of certain lots to trustees for the sole use of schools for colored children in the District of Columbia. But these acts simply provided certain limited benefits to colored children in an existing situation. Neither act established the segregation, nor can either act be construed as a constitutional judgment by Congress as to the scope and content of the 14th Amendment. None of the debates indicates such an intent. Indeed, the sponsor of these acts, Senator Morrill of Maine (36 Cong. Globe, 39th Cong., 1st sess., p. 1753), vigorously opposed racial distinctions. See ibid., pp. 570-571. Congress by these acts simply "supported the effort to take care of" the colored children "without ratifying every phase of the program." Ex parte Endo, 323 U. S. 283, 303 (1944). Nor did either Congressional failure to integrate the schools or any subsequent Congressional legislation or appropriations in support of the existing dual system freeze that segregation pattern into the fabric of our fundamental Charter of Liberty.

II. The impossibility of providing equality of educational opportunity to every child in the District of Columbia public schools within the framework of the segregated system is so plain that no remedy, short of abolition of compulsory separation by race, can prevent the inequality forbidden by the Constitution.

The physical and educational disparity between the separate public schools for white and colored children in the District of Columbia has been extensively analyzed. See, e. g., Strayer, Report of a Survey of the Public Schools of the District of Columbia (Govt. Printing Off., 1949); opinion of Judge Edgerton in Carr v. Corning, 86 U. S. App. D. C. 173, 181-194, 182 F. (2d) 14, 22-35 (1950); Rept. of President's Committee on Civil Rights, To Secure These Rights, 90 (Govt. Printing Off., 1947); Rept. of National Committee on Segregation in the Nation's Capital, Segregation in Washington, 75-81 (1948); Federation of Civic Associations, D. C., Committee on Education, A Brief Comprehensive Report on the Public Educational Facilities for Colored Children in the District of Columbia (1952). These studies document the conclusion of the President's Committee on Higher Education that "the separate and equal principle has nowhere been fully honored. Educational facilities for Negroes in segregated areas are inferior to those provided for whites. Whether one considers enrollment, over-all costs per student, teachers' salaries, transportation facilities, availability of secondary schools, or opportunities for undergraduate and gradute study, the consequences of segregation are always the same, and always adverse to the Negro citizen . . . This Commission concludes that there will be no fundamental correction of the total condition until segregation legislation is repealed." Higher Education for American Democracy, vol. II, pp. 31, 35 (Govt. Printing Off., 1947).

It is common knowledge, reflected almost daily in the Washington newspapers, that the Board of Education is striving to mitigate the many racial inequities in the school system. But no matter how the Board shifts the racial use of school buildings or what other measures it invokes in its desperate efforts to keep abreast of population changes, it is unable to do more than mildly alleviate the almost scandalous inequalities inevitable under, and resulting solely from, the dual school system.

This inability results from the very nature of the dilemma facing the Board. The Constitution forbids racial inequality. Yet the complexity of administering an educational system for a large city with a dynamic and mobile population makes impossible the achievement of equality while keeping within the arbitrary lines of race. The Board's efforts to correct the inequalities simply create almost as many other inequalities, for both white and colored children. E. g., as this Brief is being written, the Board's current budgetary makeshifts to relieve the teacher shortage in the schools for colored children are causing, in the schools for white children: firing of teachers, reassigning senior high school teachers to junior high schools and junior high teachers to elementary schools even though the Superintendent admits that such reassignment is both inefficient and "harmful to teacher morale," closing classes, turning senior high school counselors into instructors, teaching two grades in one room, disrupting educational schedules, cutting out special instruction for atypical children, etc. In the meantime, another tug-of-war is shaping up, between white and colored parents concerned about the welfare of their children, over the proposal to transfer either Bryan or Buchanan elementary school from white to colored use to relieve gross overcrowding of Negro pupils in that area. Washington Post, p. 1 (Nov. 20, 1952); ibid., pp. 1, 12 (Nov. 21, 1952). Correction of these and other inequities is frustrated by the dual system itself. So long as compulsory separation of white and colored children exists in the public schools, there will always be some colored children whose educational opportunities will be less than if they had been white, and some white children whose educational opportunities will be less than if they had been colored.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

It is no answer to say that the educational opportunities for colored children averaged as a group are substantially equivalent to the educational opportunities for white children averaged as a group. Even if this were true (which it is not), it does not mitigate the discrimination imposed on the child who, but for his race, would have received better educational opportunities. "The essence" of the constitutional right to be free from governmentally imposed racial discrimination is that "it is a personal one . . . It is the individual . . . who is entitled" to it, "not merely a group of individuals". Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60, 80 (1917); Mitchell v. United States, 313 U. S. 80, 97 (1941); Henderson v. United States, 339 U. S. 816, 825 (1950). Nor is it relevant that some white children may sometimes get less than some colored children. The constitutional guarantee against racial discrimination "is not achieved through indiscriminate imposition of inequalities". Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1, 22 (1948); Henderson v. United States, 339 U. S. 816, 825-826 (1950).

The root of the discrimination is the rigid line of the racial bar to which all other considerations are subordinated. Every effort to cure the evil of racial discrimination by "equalization" of physical facilities within a segregated system is like trying to cure cancer with a mustard plaster. Only when the dual system is uprooted can the normal processes of eliminating inequities in the District's educational system become effective.

III. The People of Washington are ready for and will accept integration of their public schools.

Actual experience, both in Washington and throughout the country, including the South, proves how fallacious is the assumption that integration of the public schools will cause "racial trouble."

Not all the schools in Washington are racist. Negroes are now being admitted, in steadily increasing numbers, into the formerly all-white parochial schools and into more and more of the formerly all-white private schools.[10] This integrated schooling brings, not trouble, but tolerance and better mutual understanding to all the students, and to the parents too. Throughout the country, public schools hitherto segregated are being peacefully integrated by cities, counties and States,[11] and by the Federal Government which operates elementary schools for the children of military and civilian personnel on federal areas, in the South as well as elsewhere.[12] "The success of the 1944 integration experiment in the service schools . . . was perhaps the major factor in increasing the demand for integration" in the military services.[13] Furthermore, over 1500 colored students have enrolled in formerly white graduate and professional schools throughout the South, following this Court's decisions of June 1950 in Sweatt and McLaurin.[14] At the under-graduate level, more and more of the previously all-white colleges and junior colleges in the South, including Berea College, the University of Kentucky, the University of Louisville, and others in Kentucky, Del Mar Junior College and others in Texas, and elsewhere, are opening their doors to colored students.[15]

The whole milieu of the District of Columbia is one of increasing change from Jim Crow to integration.[16] Segregation is gone or on the way out in many areas of public life in Washington; and the sequelae are uniformly peaceful.

The park facilities operated by the Department of the Interior, including such "sensitive" facilities as swimming pools, tourist camp lodgings, golf courses, picnic grounds, and others, are wholly non-segregated. Negroes, both as individuals and in integrated groups, are now admitted into every public building (including the public school buildings in the evening), into every major private auditorium, in at least 100 privately-owned restaurants, in all government cafeterias, and in several theaters, both stage and movie.

All the major universities and colleges in Washington, with the notorious exception of George Washington University, now admit qualified students without regard to race. Negroes are now admitted in many formerly all-white professional groups and voluntary organizations, e. g., District Medical Society, American Association of University Women, American Institute of Architects, etc. Many of the major Washington hotels now admit colored people. A considerable number of churches have mixed congregations, and practically none would refuse admission to a Negro worshipper. Segregation in streetcars and buses has been forbidden by law in the District since 1865.[17] And an 1873 statute, already held valid by the Municipal Court of Appeals, may soon end racial exclusion and segregation in all the public eating places of Washington.[18]

The largest employer in Washington, the Federal Government, has no segregation. And the District Government, which still sponsors segregation in some of its playgrounds, and in some of its departments (e.g., fire department, jail, etc.), is looking to eliminate it. The National Capital Housing Authority recently announced that its new housing projects would be nonsegregated. Significant, and peaceful, shifts in racial residential patterns have occurred since this Court in 1948 prohibited the enforcement of restrictive housing covenants. Hurd v. Hodge, 334 U. S. 24 (1948). Segregation in Washington is no longer even a political issue. Both the Republicans and Democrats promised during the 1952 campaign to end racial segregation in the District.[19]

Only the public schools remain as the unyielding stronghold of segregation in Washington, imposing racist patterns on the growing generation, to the discomfiture not only of the Negroes but also of the ever increasing number of white people who do not want their children warped by the prejudice of racial discrimination and subjected to the inferior education inevitable under a dual school system.

It is only the alleged compulsion of law, not any peculjar aspect of public education, that keeps the public school system segregated. The attitude of educators with respect to the two sets of schools is evidenced by the recommendation by both Presidents of the Teachers' Colleges (Wilson, which trains white teachers, and Miner, which trains colored teachers) that they be merged.[20]

The time is ripe, and the people of Washington are ready, for the desegregation of the public schools and for equality of educational opportunity for all.

In any event, even if there were a real possibility of "racial trouble" in the public schools of the District (which there is not), such a problem should be solved by education and by enforcing, without racial discrimination, the law against violence and disorderly conduct, not by depriving well-behaved and respectable citizens of their legal rights. Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60, 80-81 (1917); Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1, 21 (1948); Mitchell v. United States, 313 U. S. 80, 97 (1941). The imposition of compulsory segregation simply to placate those who threaten disorder and violence is to subordinate law to lawlessness, tolerance to

v.

C. MELVIN SHARPE, ET AL.

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CIRCUIT

BRIEF FOR AMICI CURIAE

INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE

This case deals with the question whether children in the public school system of the Nation's Capital may, consistently with the Constitution and laws of the United States, be separated by groups solely on the basis of skin color or the origin of their ancestors.

The undersigned submit this brief because our organizations represent groups of Americans in the Washington community and throughout the nation of many creeds and many races who are deeply committed to the preservation and extension of the democratic way of life and who reject as inimical to the welfare and progress of our country artificial barriers to the free and natural association of peoples, based on racial or creedal differences. We believe this to be of especial importance in the Nation's Capital. We are united in the belief that every step taken to make such differences irrelevant in law, as they are in fact, will tend to cure one of our democracy's conspicuous failures to practice the ideals we proclaim to the world, and to bring us closer to that peace and harmony with other peoples throughout the world for which we all strive.

We submit this brief out of a sense of urgency which compels us to speak out for great segments of the community on behalf of a good and just cause. We are convinced that the great democratic principles of our Constitution are denied when racism permeates and shapes the institutions in which the children of the Capital of the Nation receive their schooling.

We submit this brief, finally, in the knowledge that the progress and welfare of a democratic community and the best contributions of all its people toward enriching the life, the intellect, and the spirit of the community can be achieved only from the untrammeled association of fellow-citizens without the interposition, especially by government, of barriers based on race.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

This case is here on writ of certiorari to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, granted while the case was pending in that court on appeal from a judgment of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia granting a motion to dismiss the complaint. The petitioners are minors and their parents, citizens of the United States and residents of the District of Columbia, are suing on behalf of themselves and others similarly situated. The respondents here are members of the school board and officials of the public school system of the District of Columbia.

BLEED THROUGH

The complaint alleged that the minor petitioners applied for enrollment in the Sousa Junior High School of the District of Columbia and were denied enrollment solely because of their race or color and that they appropriately exhausted all administrative remedies for correction of that denial. It alleged inter alia that their exclusion from the school denied them due process of law, in violation of the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Title 8, Sections 41 and 43 of the United States Code; and constituted a bill of attainder prohibited by Article 1, Section 9, clause 3 of the Constitution. The complaint sought a declaratory judgment that the respondents had no right to exclude the minor petitioners from the Sousa School because of their race or color and an injunction restraining the respondents from such exclusion.

Respondents, without denying any of the allegations of the complaint, filed a motion to dismiss which was granted by the District Court without an opinion.

THE QUESTIONS TO WHICH THIS BRIEF IS ADDRESSED

The undersigned amici curiae believe that racial segregation in the District of Columbia public schools is unconstitutional. We refrain here from presenting such of our reasons as would parallel those presented in the brief of the petitioners already filed herein. We confine ourselves to the following two questions which we feel merit fuller discussion and on which we possess some special competence:

1. Does separation of school children by skin color or ancestry have any warrant in twentieth century community experience, proper legislative purpose, or scientific understanding?

2. Does the fact that Congress made provision for the establishment of schools for Negro children in the District of Columbia before the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment justify the conclusion that the Fourteenth Amendment was intended to permit racial segregation?

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

1. Racial classifications are not permissible in our democracy except only under the most dire of emergencies such as the "crisis of war". The conventional standards of "reasonableness" to test legislative action do not come into play when racial criteria are involved. Nor, even if it were relevant, is there any reasonable basis for separating school children by skin color. Examination of community experience in the District of Columbia and throughout the country discloses vast areas of activity in which the members of the public both voluntarily and by government action have departed from patterns of segregation and associate free of color restrictions. No rational basis exists to single out school children for racial separation.

The predictions of defiance of a decision invalidating racial segregation in schools or of difficulties resulting therefrom are neither novel nor warranted. They are not justified by community experience, history, morality, or law. To assert such factors implies that Constitutional rights must await the consent of those who withhold them.

Present day scientific knowledge discredits traditional concepts of "race." Continued enforcement of legislative action based on assumed distinctions formerly attributed to such concepts is not rational.

2. In Carr v. Corning, 182 F. 2d 14, it was held that Congress' establishment of public schools for Negroes before the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment "conclusively supports" the determination that the Amendment permitted segregation in schools. This misconceives the chronology of the events of that day and gives a completely distorted significance to the school statutes.

ARGUMENT

I.

SEPARATION OF SCHOOL CHILDREN BY SKIN COLOR OR ANCESTRY HAS NO WARRANT IN TWENTIETH CENTURY COMMUNITY EXPERIENCE, PROPER LEGISLATIVE PURPOSE, OR SCIENTIFIC UNDERSTANDING AND IS THEREFORE A MEANINGLESS CLASSIFICATION VIOLATIVE OF THE FIFTH AMENDMENT

This brief documents what twentieth-century America knows: racial segregation is not—and never was—intended to achieve any legitimate legislative goal but is a continuing attempt to maintain some vestiges of the slave system of the nineteenth century.

Classification by "race"[1] has been permitted by this Court to sustain governmental action only during the major crisis of the twentieth century and then only after "the most rigid scrutiny" had disclosed "circumstances of dire emergency and peril" stemming from "the crisis of war and threatened invasion."[2]

Though we do not suggest the propriety of even this limited impairment of the constitutional safeguards for the individual, we point out that these instances were occasioned only by extreme cases of national peril. It is only at such times that racial designations may become the basis for governmental action. No conventional problems and no ordinary standard of "reasonableness" may justify a transgression of the overriding principle that racial distinctions are odious.

[1] We use the term "race" only for simplicity of expression. We submit it has no meaning relevant to legal problems. See Section C, infra, p. 19. For purposes of brevity we have also referred generally to "skin color" as the basis adopted for segregation. Analyzed carefully, the real basis for segregation of Negroes stemming from the institution of slavery, lies in the birthland of the individual's forebears (i.e., Africa) rather than in skin color alone. For these reasons many statutes refer generally to "persons of African descent." Cf. Art. 1661.1, Sec. 2, Vernon's Statutes of Texas, Annotated (1947).

[2] Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U. S. 81, 92 (1943), and Korematsu v. United States, 323 U. S. 214, 220 (1944). Cf. Ex parte Endo, 323 U. S. 283 (1944).

Moreover, governmental classification at any time must comport with what is fundamentally just. This is the essence of due process, a term of no fixed content. The "essentials of fundamental rights" are not "confined within a permanent catalogue," for it "is of the very nature of a free society to advance in its standards of what is deemed reasonable and right." Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U. S. 25, 27 (1949). And the question whether a classification separating school children solely by race is constitutionally permissible today cannot be answered by looking backward to yesterday. Constitutional principles "may acquire meaning as public opinion becomes enlightened by a humane justice."[3] For this reason, the "boot-strap" arguments of the School Board in this case, as in all others which rely upon the authority of Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, without reexamining its premises, cannot justify this Court's failing to do so. Passenger Cases, 7 How. 283, 470 (1849). We submit that the validity of continuing today to separate school children solely according to a skin-color pp. 373-374: "Time works changes, brings into existence new conditions and purposes. Therefore a principle to be vital must be capable of wider application than the mischief which gave it birth. This is peculiarly true of constitutions. They are not ephemeral enactments, designed to meet passing occasions. * * * The future is their care and provision for events of good and bad tendencies of which no prophecy can be made. In the application of a constitution, therefore, our contemplation cannot be only of what has been but of what may be. Under any other rule a constitution would indeed be as easy of application as it would be deficient in efficacy and power. Its general principles would have little value and be converted by precedent into impotent and lifeless formulas. Rights declared in words might be lost in reality. And this has been recognized. The meaning and vitality of the Constitution have developed against narrow and restrictive construction. * * * The construction of the Fourteenth Amendment is * * * an example for it is one of the limitations of the Constitution."

[3] Weems v. United States, 217 U. S. 349 (1910):

p. 378: "The clause of the Constitution in the opinion of the learned commentators may be therefore progressive, and is not fastened to the obsolete but may acquire meaning as public opinion becomes enlightened by a humane justice."

classification must be tested in the light of today's known community and social experience, declared legislative purposes and present scientific understanding. Tested accordingly, separation of children in public schools on the basis of skin-color alone is completely without rational basis in the United States in the twentieth century.

A. Community experience demonstrates the invalidity of racial segregation in the District of Columbia or anywhere in the United States.

1. Deterioration of patterns of segregation.

As this community's experience is examined, the lack of consistency and indeed of plain common sense involved in the erection of racial barriers between groups of school children is dramatically exposed. A brief glance at Table IV (Appendix, infra) shows the vast range of public activity in which this city engages free of color restrictions. Washingtonians mingle today without regard to skin color in many restaurants, movies, hotels, libraries, swimming pools, golf courses, tennis courts, and playgrounds, in all legitimate theatres, streetcars and busses, art galleries, and music halls, and in every public building, and every auditorium in the city. They attend inter-racial nursery schools, parochial schools, colleges, law schools and medical schools. (Table II, Appendix, infra.)

On what basis, then, may they rationally be precluded from doing so in public schools? If people, young and old, can live next door to each other in apartment houses, can walk or ride together as far as school doors, and can enter together in private schools, what proper reason may be adduced to prevent them from entering those doors to study together in public schools established in the interests of all the people, by a government dedicated to democracy?[4]

[4] The President-elect has pledged himself to remove "every vestige of segregation" in the Nation's Capital to the extent of the means at his command. But this is a goal which, as this case proves, cannot be achieved by executive action alone.

Moreover, segregation in schools has been abandoned in practice in so great a portion of this country, including the South, as to make its continuation anywhere impossible to justify in principle. Compiled in the Appendix, infra, is a list of those communities, in the South and border areas, where Negro students have been recently admitted to formerly all-white schools. (Table I). This list, which is representative but by no means exhaustive, marks the unanimously successful integration, in varying degrees, of colored and white students in educational institutions in over 85 communities in such areas. (There is of course no need to detail the vast areas of the North where legal segregation has never been practiced.)

These are developments of only the past several years, chiefly following this Court's action in Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629 and McLaurin v. Oklahoma, 339 U. S. 637, in 1950. In that short time, one or more educational institutions in practically every Southern, Southwestern and Border state have opened their doors to Negroes, who had previously been excluded altogether. For example, tax-supported colleges and universities have opened their doors to Negro students in Texas, Oklahoma, Arkansas, Kansas, Missouri, Louisiana, Kentucky, Tennessee, Virginia, North Carolina, West Virginia, Maryland and Delaware. (Table III(A) (1) (b), Appendix, infra).

Despite the continued insistence of those who urge the continuance of segregation on the ground that the country is "not ready," these changes have not been limited to public colleges which alone would be compelled by the enforcement of the Fourteenth Amendment to open their doors. Non-public institutions have been far in the lead in the process of integration. Schools and colleges, both private and parochial, have removed racial barriers to admission in Alabama, Texas, Georgia, Missouri, Louisiana, Kentucky, Maryland, North Carolina, Virginia, West Virginia, and as mentioned, the District of Columbia. (Table III (A) (2), Appendix, infra). This merits special attention, for if segregation were as embedded in the "usages, customs and traditions" of the South as it is alleged to be, none of these institutions would have departed therefrom without compulsion. But freed of governmental compulsion to segregate (or exclude) by the aftermath of this Court's decisions in the Sweatt and McLaurin cases which substantially destroyed segregation in public colleges, these non-public schools have dropped the color bars in numbers and with a speed and fervor[5] which make it plain that it was only the barrier of the South's government-required segregation which had earlier stood in their way—and not the South's "usages, customs and traditions."

In addition to the colleges and universities in which segregation has been abandoned, public elementary and high schools have successfully ended segregation in recent years in one or more communities in California, Arizona, New Mexico, Kansas, Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, Maryland, Delaware, Pennsylvania and New Jersey. Public schools supported entirely by Federal funds have been integrated at Fort Bragg and Camp Lejeune, North Carolina, Quantico, Virginia, Fort Knox, Kentucky and other southern military reservations.

The District of Columbia has been no laggard in this pattern of change. Only where law is interpreted to forbid departure from segregation (as the D. C. Board of Education maintains is true here) has there been no corresponding progress. Private schools, at all levels of study, have dropped the color bar. This is true of pre-nursery, nursery, elementary and high schools, as well as colleges and graduate schools. (Table II, Appendix, infra).

[5] The reactions of white students have been extremely favorable. They have welcomed the newly arrived Negroes with group demonstrations of approval, have called for change at colleges refusing admission to Negroes, have written articles for the press, and have called on the President of the United States for assistance to end racial restrictions. Table IV (B) Appendix, infra.

Moreover, neither in the District nor in other places which have known segregation are these changes occurring only in schools. We have compiled in Table IV a wide variety of instances (which is only a sampling of thousands of similar cases) in which places of public accommodation, voluntary associations, religious bodies, employers, and the athletic and entertainment world have followed where enlightened public thinking has beckoned.

These developments have significance for our problem because everywhere one looks—in colleges and universities, in factories, in state legislatures and city councils, in theaters, in stadia, in restaurants, in swimming pools, and throughout our Armed Forces—there has developed an increasing and cumulative mingling of people of different racial origins on a scale which makes ludicrous the continued separation of children in their formative years at school. Those who ride, play, and work, who fight and die together without strife may—nay, do—study together without strife.

This wide-ranging experience with integration, it should be added, is a judicial, not a legislative, consideration for it provides conclusive practical confirmation of the propositions that (1) separation based on race has no rational basis in our society and (2) integration presents nothing remotely like war-time "dire emergency and peril" which alone might justify separation (Korematsu v. United States, supra, p. 220), but in fact proceeds peacefully.

2. The prophesied community resistance to change.

Departures from segregation have been successful to a degree that surpasses even the most optimistic expectations of the proponents of such change. They continually refute the forecasts of those who on each and every such occasion predict violence, resistance, difficulties and, at very least, common dissatisfaction with the change.

If these predictions were made by those who previously had urged the removal of barriers toward equality they might be listened to with good grace. But though the words are different the voice is the same. These are the last-ditch arguments of those who would still preserve something of their ancestors' 19th Century class superiority, with its intolerable burdens on other human beings, while they also enjoy all the benefits of 20th Century society.

BLEED THROUGH

Furthermore, the mere assertion of such factors as worthy of consideration by this Court necessarily implies a belief that even if the Constitutional rights of an individual—or thousands of individuals—are being violated justice shall be rendered them only if those who withhold those rights will consent. Such a belief our democracy rejects.

And this aside, these assertions are unsound judged even by empirical standards rather than moral principle. In Sweatt v. Painter, supra (October Term, 1949, No. 44), the appellees warned that "forced mixed schools" would "cause large withdrawals from the public schools" (Appellees' Brief, p. 175). The brief amicus filed by the Attorneys General of eleven states was even more direful (at p. 9), citing reports of impending disturbance at East St. Louis and Alton, Illinois, two southern Illinois cities where the schools were being desegregated under force by law, and of apparent trouble at desegregated swimming pools in Washington, D. C., and St. Louis, Missouri[6]:

[6] The swimming pool incidents referred to by the Attorneys General refute rather than support their argument. In Washington, the disturbance was an isolated incident which has been followed since 1950 by operation of pools under jurisdiction of the Interior Department without segregation and without the slightest difficulty. Comment, 18 Univ. Chi. L. Rev. 769, 773-775 (1951). And the attendance has shown a continuing increase. (Table IV, item (8) Appendix, infra.) The St. Louis experience was even more revealing. There the city officials reacted to an outbreak of violence by reversing their previously adopted decision to end segregation. A law suit was commenced to prevent segregation. Id. at 771-772. United States District Judge Hulen firmly rejected the argument that segregation should be retained to prevent disorder. Calling this "a new and novel theory", he ruled that "The law permits of no such delay in the protection of plaintiffs' constitutional rights".

> The Southern States trust that this Court will not strike down their power to keep peace, order, and support of the public schools by maintaining equal separate facilities. If the States are shorn of this police power and physical conflict takes place, as in the St. Louis and Washington swimming pools, the States are left with no alternative but to close their schools for that reason.

Of course, no "physical conflict" took place because of the decision which the Attorneys General feared. Instead, in less than two years the number of Negroes who have been peacefully integrated into Southern graduate and professional schools exceeds well over a thousand, and the tabulation is no longer a matter of much interest since the point is proved beyond debate.

In the Henderson case, infra (October Term, 1949, No. 25), the brief amicus filed by Rep. Sam Hobbs warned flatly that "that to adopt the contention of Appellant would be the kiss of death to render operation of the railroad impossible" (p. 5). In Morgan v. Virginia, 328 U. S. 373 (1946) (October Term, 1945, No. 704), the Commonwealth of Virginia, Appellee, warned that the statute which the Court subsequently invalidated was necessary to prevent violent altercations which would cause drivers to lose control of their busses (Appellee's brief, p. 14). The effects of a reversal of the decision below were painted in lurid terms (Id. at pp. 18-20).

Again, no such evils resulted. In fact, the Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit has had occasion to point out that no disorders occurred on the cars of a Virginia railroad which recently abandoned segregation to the extent it found convenient. Chance v. Lambeth, 186 F. 2d 879, 881, 882-883 (C.A. 4th, 1951).

We are not so naive as to discount the possibility of some forms of resistance to a decision that racial segregation in public grade schools is unconstitutional. But the prophecy of violence has so often been shown to be without substance [7] that it is now made with little conviction. Of course, this Court conclusively answered what has been called the "rhetoric of violence"[8] when it squarely held that the preservation of the public peace cannot be accomplished by laws which violate the Constitution. Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60, 81 (1917).

It goes without saying that to deny a constitutional right because the lawless element of a community dislikes its enforcement is to suggest that the Federal compact is no match for the lynch-law mob.

Recognition of these facts by those who still seek to uphold segregation leads to their more sophisticated suggestion that the abolition of segregation at this time will (a) destroy public education in the South or (b) destroy the liberal or progressive movement in the South. The fact is that public education will no more be threatened by the Court's action against segregation in these cases than it was by its action in the cases of Sweatt v. Painter, supra; McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, supra, and Henderson v. United States, 339 U. S. 816. At best such arguments in effect only urge delay in the disposition of the constitutional question. But delay is more likely to aggravate than to solve these alleged problems.[9] Moreover,

[8] Comment, 18 Univ. Chi. L. Rev. 769, 781 (1951).

[9] In the meantime the denial of constitutional rights is itself productive of disorder. As a Georgia court noted long ago, "in the end, if those laws are unfair, unjust, unequal, they will breed discontent and disorder, and it is better for the peace and good order of society that all shall have equal rights." White v. Clements, 39 Ga. 232, 269 (1869).

these arguments were not first urged upon this Court when the Sweatt and Henderson cases were argued; they were put forth over 75 years ago (Cf. 2 Cong. Record 4153 (1874); 3 Cong. Record 981-982, 997, 1002 (1875)).

Nor are these alleged problems peculiar to the South. The quality of individual prejudice is not governed solely by the residence of the individual. Integration proposals have brought prophecies of violent resistance in northern waterfront towns like Camden, N. J., no less than in Clarendon County, S. C., and of destruction of public education in Alton, Illinois no less than in Atlanta, Georgia. But Camden saw no violence and is fully integrated, and Alton, rather than give up the State's monetary contribution to its public schools, gave up segregation. This was done grudgingly, but it was done—peacefully and completely.

We submit that if there is to be resistance, it will take the form not of destruction but of evasion. And the patterns of evasion are by this time familiar. Although the practice of excluding Negroes from the Democratic Party primary in the South was first condemned in 1927 (Nixon v. Herndon, 273 U. S. 536) this Court was called on several times thereafter to consider the validity of attempted evasions of that decision.[10] Even after the last decision there were further attempts—continuing to the present day[11]—which were dealt with by the lower courts.[12]

Ultimately the fight will be completely abandoned. Negroes are now voting in constantly increasing numbers in the Democratic primary and general elections in the South, and candidates make special efforts to win their support.[13]

And so, while we may expect gerrymandering and possibly so-called "private" corporations operating the schools for one or a few of the States, we freely predict that in this day and age there will be neither real abandonment nor educational deterioration of the public school system in the areas involved. Furthermore, in the District of Columbia community acceptance and respect for legal authority is obviously such that there can be no fear whatever that this Court's order will be resisted here. As Judge Edgerton said in his dissent in Carr v. Corning, 182 F. 2d 14, 33: "When United States courts order integration of District of Columbia schools they will be integrated". (Emphasis supplied).*

We know, too, that despite the urging of the prophets of doom this Court will not permit basic Constitutional rights to be reduced by the lowest pessimistic denominator.

* Only last week the Superintendent of Schools said the school system would not be unprepared for a decision ending segregation, Washington Post, Nov. 29, 1952. By contrast, we regard as particularly unfortunate the Court's statement in the Carr case, supra, p. 16, that the problems with which it was dealing were "insoluble by force of any sort." The same amount of "force" is exercised by segregated as by unsegregated schools. The present practices in the District of Columbia school system are just as "forceful" to those who desire to associate with their fellows without artificial racial barriers as an unsegregated system would be to those who wish to keep aloof.

B. Declared legislative prohibitions against segregation in other areas of activity in the District of Columbia demonstrate the further irrationality of school segregation.

The classification of groups of children in the public schools by skin color alone must also be tested in the light of legislative action affecting other group relationships in the community.

As early as 1865,[14] the Congress expressly forbade any street railway company in the District of Columbia to exclude any person from any car, and since then there has been no "Jim-Crow" transportation in the District. In 1872 and 1873, the Legislative Assembly for the District enacted laws (referred to as the "Equal Service Laws") forbidding the refusal to serve any well-behaved person in any eating place, barber shop or hotel.[15] Thereafter, in 1875, the Congress enacted the famed Civil Rights Act,[16] forbidding racial discrimination or exclusion in places of public accommodation throughout the country, including the District of Columbia.

This series of legislative measures, then, carved out vast areas for the free association of peoples in the District. As opposed to the direct prohibitions against segregation in these instances where Congress has clearly expressed its intention on the subject, no instance has been found where the Congress requires segregation. (It should be noted that the statutes relied upon here as establishing a segregated school system are not mandatory in form—unlike school and other statutes in the South which explicitly require segregation. See compilation in the Appendix to the Petitioners' brief, herein.)

In this context, particularly in view of the other broad areas of present free community association mentioned in Section A, supra, it becomes impossible to accept as having rational foundation a legislative classification singling public school children alone out of the entire community for governmental separation based solely on race.

C. Present scientific understanding discredits traditional concepts of "race".

Governmental classifications must also be tested in the light of present-day scientific understanding.

It seems hardly necessary at this late date to offer proof that conduct governed by assumed distinctions attributed to race is wholly arbitrary. Moreover, the concept of "race", which has been thought to have a scientific explanation based on esoteric classifications used by physical anthropologists, have been demonstrated by mature students of anthropology to be largely lacking even such a foundation, and they have shown that no significance whatever can be attached to skin color alone. Boyd, Genetics and the Races of Man (Little, Brown & Co., 1950), pp. 10-27, 184-207.[17]

Certainly in the Western World no nation is anything but a mixture of many kinds of racial groups. The term [17] "The biological fact of race and the myth of 'race' should be distinguished. For all practical social purposes 'race' is not so much a biological phenomenon as a social myth. The myth of 'race' has created an enormous amount of human and social damage. * * * It still prevents the normal development of millions of human beings and deprives civilization of the effective co-operation of productive minds. The biological differences between ethnic groups should be disregarded from the standpoint of social acceptance and social action." Statement by Experts on Race Problems, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, July 18, 1950. See also LaFarge, The Race Question and the Negro; Redfield, What We Do Know About Race, 57 Scientific Monthly 193 (Sept., 1943); Krogman, An Anthropologist Looks at Race, 7 Intercultural Education News 1 (Nov., 1945).

"white" is racially meaningless as applied to almost all American or European whites. There are fair-haired, tall, long-headed North Europeans and dark-haired, less tall, round-headed South Europeans. And there are all those who run the gamut. They are all race mixtures. Benedict & Weltfish, Races of Mankind (Public Affairs Committee, 1944). Even more certain is it that the American Negro is not a "race". Not only were the original African slaves members of different "racial" groups (from different parts of Africa) but their cross-fertilization with "white" Americans has been extensive. As early as 1920 at least 15.9 per cent of the "Negro" population was visibly mulatto. Klineberg, Characteristics of the American Negro (Harper, 1944), p. 268. And a recent study by John Hopkins and Pittsburgh University professors discloses that the Negro population in the United States is 30 per cent white in its ancestry. THE FACT THAT CONGRESS MADE PROVISION FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF SCHOOLS FOR NEGRO CHILDREN IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BEFORE THE ADOPTION OF THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT DOES NOT JUSTIFY THE CONCLUSION THAT THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT WAS INTENDED TO PERMIT RACIAL SEGREGATION.

Petitioners urge in this case that racial segregation in the schools operated by the District of Columbia government is discriminatory per se and consequently prohibited by the Fifth Amendment. The argument rests on the firmly based principle that "distinctions between citizens solely because of their ancestry are by their very nature odious to a free people whose institutions are founded upon the doctrine of equality". Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U. S. 81, 100 (1943).

It is urged, however, by those seeking to uphold school separation based on race alone that neither the Fifth nor the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution, prohibits segregation.[17a] In this connection, reliance is placed on certain statutes enacted by the United States Congress for the education of Negro children in the District of Columbia at about the same time the Congress submitted the Fourteenth Amendment to the states for ratification. The theory suggested is that these statutes expressly provided for the establishment of segregated schools for Negro and white children and that, hence, the Congress of that period could not have viewed the constitutional principles embodied in the Fourteenth Amendment as prohibiting racial segregation.

This argument was given much weight by the majority opinion (Edgerton, J., dissenting) of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit in Carr v. Corning, 182 F. 2d 14 (1950).[18] Judge Prettyman's opinion there reviewed the statutes in question and concluded that they "conclusively support" the view that the Fourteenth Amendment does not prohibit segregation. Ibid, pp. 17-19.

We have already indicated our contention that the reason or unreason of a classification such as separate racial schools must be judged on the basis of contemporary conditions and current knowledge, and not governed by the dead hand of the past. Weems v. United States, 217 U .S. 349, 373-374, 378 (1910). But because we wish to meet squarely the argument from history, just outlined, we turn now to an analysis of the past as it is involved therein.

[17a] Brief for Respondents herein, pp. 36-37; Brief for Appellees in Briggs v. Elliott, No. 101 this term, p. 15; Brief for Appellees in Davis v. County School Board, No. 191 this term, pp. 12-13.

[18] The complaint in the Carr case, as in this one, challenged the constitutionality of segregation in the District of Columbia public schools. The Court of Appeals upheld segregation and no review of its decision was sought in this Court. In the instant case, the District Court in granting the motion to dismiss, stated in an oral opinion that it was bound by the Carr decision.

Such analysis shows that the conclusion on the part of the Court of Appeals in the Carr case was neither required nor justified in the light of the genesis of the local laws and of the Fourteenth Amendment. On the contrary, the conclusion that the Fourteenth Amendment was intended to prohibit segregation is fully documented in the penetrating study by Flack in his The Adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment (1908), by the petitioner's brief in Sweatt v. Painter, supra (pp. 54-62), by the amicus brief of the Committe of Law Teachers in that case (pp. 5-19), and by the latest and perhaps most exhaustive study of all, Frank and Munro, The Original Understanding of "Equal Protection of the Laws," 50 Col. L. Rev. 131, 153-62 (1940). We shall not repeat that presentation here.

This conclusion cannot be cavalierly swept aside simply by finding in isolated statutes, narrow and localized in scope and enacted years before the ratification of a constitutional amendment over which the entire nation seethed, a purpose completely at variance with the whole thrust of that amendment as it was generally understood.

In the Carr case, Judge Prettyman cited six statutes. Only five of these are actually relevant.[19] These five statutes were enacted between 1862 and 1866—and the dates are crucial, since the Court of Appeals inferred, from the fact that they were (1) contemporaneous with the passage by Congress of the proposed Fourteenth Amendment and (2) seemingly inconsistent with an anti-segregation interpretation of that Amendment, that the Amendment itself could not have been intended to abolish segregation.

[19] The reference in the Carr decision (pp. 17-18) to Sections 281, 282, 294 and 304 of the revision of the D. C. Statutes (Act of June 22, 1874, 18 Stat. part 2) appears erroneously to assume that these provisions were first enacted in that year. In fact, these are sections taken from the Act of June 25, 1864, 13 Stat. 187, 191, from which Judge Prettyman had already drawn significance, and no additional significance can be found in their inclusion in the 1874 Revision, since that was merely part of a Congressional attempt to provide up-to-date compilations of existing law—one such compilation for the District of Columbia, and another (U. S. Revised Statutes, 1872 and 1878) of the general laws of the United States. Certainly there is no suggestion that any consideration was given by Congress in 1874 to the determination of racial policy which is inherent in the inference drawn by Judge Prettyman.

But the inference is by no means either necessary or correct. It is based on a misconception of both the pertinency of the chronology and the purposes of the school statutes.

When the Fourteenth Amendment was proposed in June 1866, its framers obviously had no means of knowing how many years would elapse before its ratification by the states; in fact, it was not until July 1868, more than two years later, that it was declared ratified. The mere fact that the Amendment was proposed in 1866, at approximately the same time as the 1866 statutes, does not, as Judge Prettyman implies, necessarily impute to the Congress a purpose in that Amendment to perpetuate segregated schools.[20] It may equally suggest a desire to deal with the problem on a national basis rather than a local one, just as the Congress later did, in the Civil Rights Act of 1875, when it prohibited discrimination of any kind in places of public accommodation anywhere in the United States, including the District of Columbia.[21] We recognize that Congress, prior to the Fourteenth Amendment, was making provision for schools which, when they were finally established, were separate. But to conclude from this that Congress intended to perpetuate this situation, come what may, is to fail to distinguish between mere recognition of the historical fact of segregation and a mandate for segregation.

In fact, what the historical development of public education for colored children does amply demonstrate is that the Congress was concerned in the 1860's with obtaining education for those children, and further that Congress was never faced with the issue of granting or denying a request

[20] Moreover, it should be recognized that there is significance in the fact that the path travelled through the Houses of Congress by the Bill dealing with District schools was obviously different from that taken by the Bill proposing the Fourteenth Amendment. The origin, committee consideration, and debates were totally different from the two matters.

[21] Act of March 1, 1875, 18 Stat. 335.

that there should be "integrated" education. At that time public education of any kind was still regarded in many quarters as invidious, and education for the Negro (who in many states was still forbidden to learn to read or write) had only a short while prior thereto been deemed wholly objectionable by some legislators.[22]

In 1862, only a few weeks after slaves were freed in the District of Columbia[23] (and almost a year before the Emancipation Proclamation of January 1, 1863) the Congressional action was an attempt for the first time to provide "free"[24] public education for colored children. The Congress was concerned with that problem alone.

Similarly, in 1864,[25] when Congress provided that the amount used to support schools for colored children should be appropriated from the general revenues of the cities of Washington and Georgetown in accordance with the ratio of colored children to the total number of children, Congress was faced only with the problem whether (in view of the exceedingly small sums allotted by the authorities to the colored schools)[26] they should continue to tax colored persons separately to support schools for colored children.[27]

So, too, when in 1866 [28] Congress expressly ordered that the Act of 1864 be construed so as to require the cities of Washington and Georgetown to pay over the appropriated sums to the trustees of colored schools, Congress had not been requested to "integrate" but was acting only to overcome the continued reluctance of the municipal authorities to make any but the most completely inadequate provision for the education of colored children. And further, when the following week[29] the Congress authorized the conveyance of certain lands of the United States to the trustees of colored schools it was again seeking to provide education for colored children; it was not determining a question of racial policy. Since at that very time Congress was debating the question whether segregation would be outlawed by the proposed Amendment,[30] it may be supposed that Congress would have been astonished to be told that it was elsewhere determining that very question—and by means of a localized statute, not a Constitutional Amendment of nation-wide scope and interest.

In sum, the whole point is that the major portion of the period under analysis was prior to and not contemporaneous with the Fourteenth Amendment and (as the Corporation Counsel has argued in another context)[31] "the laws setting up schools for colored were enacted at a time when members of that race were afforded no schooling whatsoever. The purpose of the laws was to give rather than to take away, was to afford opportunity rather than deny opportunity * * *."

Additional evidence of historical misconstruction in the Carr opinion is found in the fact that, contemporaneously with the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment by the Congress, there was also enacted the bitterly fought over

Civil Rights Bill of 1866.[32] So significant was that Bill that the Amendment was "sidetracked to give full sway to that important measure."[33] This bill was generally understood to have the effect of opening white schools to Negroes.[34] But this very fact was believed to raise substantial doubts as to its validity on the ground that it was an exercise of the powers of the States. Accordingly, the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment was designed to meet this alleged Constitutional infirmity and to make secure the provisions of the Civil Rights Bill.[35]

Following the ratification of the Amendment, the Bill was re-enacted[36] and has been enforced by this Court as recently as 1948, in Hurd v. Hodge, 334 U. S. 24.[37]

Thus it is plain that the conclusion reached in the Carr case not only ignores the time sequence of the statutes and the ratification of the Amendment, but also gives a completely distorted significance to the school legislation.

CONCLUSION

The advances commenced by the Civil War were slowed and almost halted by judicial gloss on the Fourteenth Amendment. We trust that it is worth reminding the Court that segregation is not a Constitutional command. It was nothing more than a de facto social phenomenon until this Court itself gave it legal and Constitutional dignity by its majority decision in Plessy v. Ferguson. By [37] The respondents argue that the failure to include schools within the coverage of the Civil Rights Act of 1875 indicates Congressional intent to permit segregation. (Br. p. 37) The answer to this is two-fold: (1) It was not that Congress which proposed the Fourteenth Amendment; and (2) the omission of schools was a purely political and practical matter, not negating the understanding that the Amendment (though obviously not self-executing) did prohibit separate schools. now it has become clear that "separate" in practice is never "equal", and it now needs only this Court's determination to strip from segregation its spurious dignity, by holding with Mr. Justice Harlan that "Our Constitution is color-blind."

Summary of Argument 5

Argument:

I. A segregated school system is harmful to all the races involved. Its inconsistency is detrimental to the educational process as a whole and materially affects the opportunities of the minority group. 6

II. Segregation in public schools inevitably results in inferior educational opportunities for Negroes. 7

III. Segregation in public schools deprives the negro student of an important element of the education process. Where this occurs under the color of law, he is thereby deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law in violation of the Fifth Amendment..... 9

IV. The segegated school system operated by the Board of Education of the District of Columbia violates the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. 11

APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CIRCUIT.

MOTION FOR LEAVE TO FILE BRIEF AS AMICUS CURIAE.

To the Honorable Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States:

The undersigned as counsel for and on behalf of American Federation of Teachers, respectfully moves this Honorable Court for leave to file the accompanying brief as Amicus Curiae. Consent has been given by counsel for appellants and appellees. The letters giving such consent accompany this brief.

The American Federation of Teachers is an organization of more than 350 locals of 60,000 teachers throughout the country, committed to a policy of "Democracy in Education—Education for Democracy". Its membership consists chiefly of classroom teachers who do the actual work of teaching the children in the nation's schools.

In its own affairs it is committed to a practice of complete equality and non-segregation between teachers of every race. Its Constitution provides:

> "Section 11 (of Article III). No discrimination shall ever be shown toward individual members, or applicants for membership because of race * * *."

It has worked unceasingly throughout its history, and with greater intensity in recent years, for the abolition of all forms of discrimination and segregation in education based on racial differences.

Its members, as shown by the proceedings of its national conventions, have repeatedly asserted a fixed opinion that segregated school systems are a basic violation of the rights guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States.

Counsel for the American Federation of Teachers.

BRIEF OF THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF TEACHERS AS AMICUS CURIAE.

The American Federation of Teachers submits this brief as amicus curiae in view of the great importance to democracy and the cause of education of the constitutional issues involved in this case.

Through the daily experience of its members the American Federation of Teachers is cognizant of the harm done to education by the practice of segregated schools.

Opinions Below.

Statutes Involved.

The opinions below and the statutes involved are set out in the brief of the appellants.

Question Presented.

The question presented here is whether or not the Board of Education of the District of Columbia deprives the Negro school children, including the appellants, of rights secured by the Constitution and laws of the United States, including the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States and the Federal Civil Rights Act.

Statement.

This is a class action in which the plaintiffs seek an injunction restraining the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, its members and employees, from operating a system of schools in the District of Columbia in which separate schools are operated for white and colored children and mandating them to admit the minor appellants and other Negro children similarly situated to the public schools of the District of Columbia without discrimination based on race or color. A motion to dismiss was filed by the defendants and the case was dismissed by the District Court on the ground that the complaint failed to state a cause of action upon which relief could be granted. The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia upheld this decision and the case is before the United States Supreme Court for review.

The substantial issue is whether segregation of children in the grade and high schools of the District of Columbia is per se a denial of "due process" and the equal protection of the laws and of the rights of the plaintiffs and others similarly situated under the Federal Civil Rights Statute.

Summary of Argument.

In this brief amicus curiae the American Federation of Teachers will argue that segregation in the schools violates the basic principles of the educational process; that Negro children forced by the authorities of the District of Columbia to attend segregated schools are, by virtue of such segregation denied the protection of the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution and of Federal statutes enacted pursuant thereto.

ARGUMENT.

I.

A segregated school system is harmful to all the races involved. Its inconsistency is detrimental to the educational process as a whole and materially affects the opportunities of the minority group.

The American Federation of Teachers, on behalf of its 60,000 members, submits that segregation in public schools inevitably results in inferior education for all.

This organization, composed almost entirely of classroom teachers, is cognizant of the loss of human values and the waste of the resources of the spirit that results from such a system.

In a broad sense the consequence is a denial of the highest ends of education, both to the dominant and minority groups. In an atmosphere of inequality, it is no more feasible to teach the principles of our American way to the white children than to the Negroes. The apparent insincerity of such teaching is as destructive to the moral sense of the majority as to the sense of justice of the minority. The fundamental morality of each is undermined.

To the conscientious teacher the incongruity of such a system presents a barrier to the teaching of basic values of truth, beauty and justice. For if justice is relative and depends on race or color how can we teach that ours is a government of laws and not of men? And if justice is relative and considers race and color then a different flag waves over a colored school and the pledge to the flag must mean different things. The one nation is really not one nation but at least two, it is found to be divisible, and liberty, like justice, has two meanings.

These are the deep rooted evils that teachers see in a segregated school system. The system results in inferior educational facilities for the Negro and deprives him of an important element of the educational process. The damage to him is material both as to quantity and quality.

The damage to the white child is more subtle. In a moral and spiritual sense he is corrupted, while the other is corroded. The material advantage is purchased at the cost of an uneasy spirit.

And in the last analysis, the teacher is caught in a maze of contradiction from which there is no escape save by a destruction of the system. The classroom teacher sees this case as the means of cleansing the fountainhead of our national ideals.

We in America rightly put our hope of future greatness in our schools. We see in constantly improving education our hope for civil and political righteousness. In our quest it is well that we look again and again

> "unto the rock whence we are hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence we are dug."

II.

Segregation in public schools inevitably results in inferior educational opportunities for Negroes.

If we restrict our attention to the standards of educational opportunity that can be expressed in dollars expended and facilities that can be measured and counted, we find a vast disparity between white and colored schools.

Commenting on the study of Dr. John Norton and Dr. Eugene Lawler—Public School Expenditures (1944) W. Harden Hughes states:

> "The contrasts in support of white and Negro schools are appalling . . . the median expenditure per standard classroom unit in schools for white children is $1,160 as compared with $476 for Negro children. Only 2.56% of class rooms in the white schools fall below the $500 cost level while 52.59% of the class rooms for Negro children are below this level."[1]

> "The state supported institutions of higher learning for Negroes are far inferior" states Charles S. Mangrum, Jr., "to their sister institutions for whites. Most of the inequalities which have been noted herein with respect to the public schools for whites and Negroes are also present in the Negro normal and technical schools. . . . There is hardly one among them that could compare with any good white college in the same area."[2]

Several recent studies,[3] as well as many previous ones, all indicate the great disparity between the educational opportunities afforded white youth and those offered to the Negro youth in the states where a segregated and discriminatory system of education prevails.

So obvious are the inequalities that in Volume 1 of the National Survey of the Higher Education of Negroes we find this statement: "No one with a knowledge of the facts believes that Negroes enjoy all the privileges which American democracy expressly provides for the citizens of the United States and even for those aliens of the white race who reside among us. The question goes much deeper than the Negro citizens' legal right to equal educational opportunity. The question is whether American democracy and what we like to call the American way of life, can stand the strain of perpetuating an undemocratic situation; and whether the nation can bear the social cost of utilizing only a fraction of the potential contribution of so large a portion of the American population.[4]

The Constitution is a living instrument, and a "separate but equal" doctrine based upon antiquated considerations, should not, at this time, and in this advanced era, be permitted to perpetuate a situation which denies full equality to Negroes in the pursuit of education.

III.

Segregation in public schools deprives the Negro student of an important element of the education process. Where this occurs under the color of law, he is thereby deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law in violation of the Fifth Amendment.

The practice of segregation in the field of education is a denial of education itself. Education means more than the physical school room and the books it contains, and the teacher who instructs. It includes the learning that comes from free and full association with other students in the school. To restrict that association is to deny full and equal opportunities in the learning process. To restrict that association is to deny the constitutional guarantees.

Psychologists show us that learning is an emotional as well as an intellectual process; that it is social as well as individual, and is best secured in an environment which encourages and stimulates the best effort of the individual and holds out the hope that this best effort will be accepted and used by society.

In every situation there is the inter-relation of the individual to his group—which is one that increases with his maturity. First it is the family, then the local community, then the state, the nation, and finally the entire world. At no stage of development should any barriers be erected to prevent the individual from moving from a narrower group to a larger one, particularly barriers on race. As Lewin states:

> "The group to which an individual belongs is the ground on which he stands, which gives or denies him social status, gives or denies him security and help. The firmness or weakness of this ground might not be consciously perceived, just as the firmness of the physical ground on which we tread is not always thought of. Dynamically, however, the firmness and clearness of this ground determine what the individual wishes to do, what he can do, and how he will do it. This is equally true of the social ground as of the physical."[5]

If education can be made available to all so that each may develop to the fullest and give his contribution to society, we will find a peaceful way—rather than one of human destruction and tragedy—to bring freedom and justice to peoples.

The American Federation of Teachers believes that segregated and discriminatory education is undemocratic and contrary both to sound educational development as well as to the basic law of the land—the United States Constitution. We subscribe to the principle that democratic education provides a total environment which will enable the individual to develop to his capacity, physically, emotionally, intellectually and spiritually.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

For such training to be fully effective, it is essential that each individual participate, without barriers of race, creed, or national origin, as a full fledged member in the home, the community, the state and the nation.

Accordingly, any restriction, particularly in the form of segregated and discriminatory schooling, which prevents the interplay of ideas, personalities, information and attitudes, impedes a democratic education and ultimately prevents a working democracy.

IV.

The segregated school system operated by the Board of Education of the District of Columbia violates the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment.

The Fourteenth Amendment made Negroes citizens of the United States and was intended to protect them fully in the exercise of their rights and privileges. To make sure that this intent was fully known, Congress refused to readmit Southern States or seat their representatives until the states accepted the Fourteenth Amendment.

In construing the Fourteenth Amendment the Supreme Court has established a rule of law that discrimination based on race or color violates the constitutional guarantee.

The court has applied this rule in the field of higher education in two recent cases. Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629; McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637.

The court has applied this rule with equal firmness in other fields, and has made no distinction between cases arising under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. The national policy has been applied to racial discrimination by both State and Federal agencies. (Cases cited in Appellants' Brief, pp. 6-8.)

The opportunity, the duty, and the stern necessity of a consistent application of the rules are dramatically present in this case. Here the Court may become the schoolmaster and teach the lesson that others have failed to teach. The most important place to teach the lesson is in the nation's schools, and if the lesson is learned there it will be learned everywhere.

In McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637, 70 S. Ct. Rep. 851 the court held that the requirements of state law that the instruction of a Negro graduate student in the University of Oklahoma "upon a segregated basis" deprived the appellant in that case of his personal and present right to the equal protection of the laws.

There is no reason in experience for applying a different logic to children in grade and high schools. As the court there said, Our society grows increasingly complex and our need for trained leaders increases correspondingly.

We cannot give separate training to two segments of society and then expect that some magic will merge the individual from these segments into equal citizens having equal opportunities.

It is a mockery to say that those who aspire to teach and lead must have equal opportunity regardless of race, and still condemn those they are to teach and lead to inequality.

Ninety years of segregated schools demand the historical judgment that separate facilities are inevitably unequal and are not the way to equal opportunity.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In the segregated school system the growing citizen never has the chance to show his equal ability; he never has the > "opportunity to secure acceptance by his fellow students on his own merits." McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637, 641.

He must wait until he has finished what schooling he gets before he enters the competition. For him "the personal and present right to the equal protection of the laws" is of as great practical importance as for the graduate student.

The constitutional guarantee is not for law students and post-graduates alone. It is meaningless if it does not apply to all.

Conclusion.

Segregation of Negroes in public schools in any of our States or Territories inevitably results in depriving Negroes of educational opportunities provided by those States or Territories for white citizens. Negroes in such States are thereby denied the equal protection of the laws and are deprived of valuable rights without due process of law. This Court should end these violations of the constitutional mandate by reversing the judgment in this case and granting the appellants the relief they pray for.

MOTION FOR PERMISSION TO FILE BRIEF AS AMICUS CURIAE

To the Honorable Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States:

The undersigned counsel for and on behalf of the Federation of Citizens Associations of the District of Columbia (hereinafter referred to as the Federation), respectfully move this Honorable Court for permission to file the accompanying brief as amicus curiae.

The Federation is a corporate organization; one of its purposes, as stated in its Charter, is to obtain the expression of the general public sentiment upon matters of special interest to all citizens of the District of Columbia and to secure and make effective their united actions. The Federation consists of duly elected delegates from fifty-seven neighborhood citizens associations, the territorial jurisdictions of which cover almost all of the District of Columbia. The membership of the individual associations is composed of white persons who are, to a large extent, parents of school children affected by the Court's decision of May 17, 1954 and by the plan of the Board of Education. In the aggregate the members and their children number many thousands. The matters embraced in Questions 4 and 5 propounded by the Court have been discussed and considered extensively at meetings of the fifty-seven associations and the Federation.

The reasons for the Federation's desire to submit the brief as amicus curiae, which is tendered herewith, are as follows:

1. For many years the Federation has concurred with the Board of Education and has supported it in the maintenance of a dual public school system in accordance with the pertinent Acts of Congress. The Court's decision of May 17, 1954 declared in effect that such dual system is unconstitutional. So far as the Federation has been able to learn, the Board of Education has accepted the Court's decision and has determined to eliminate segregation, without awaiting the further decision and decree of the Court and without obtaining legislation from Congress to replace the Acts of Congress under which the Board theretofore acted, which the Court has held unconstitutional. The Federation does not oppose desegregation but holds that the plan which the Board of Education has adopted involves unnecessary speed of action and many hardships upon the school children, in violation of their rights as citizens, which rights the Court apparently has fully recognized in its opinion in this case and the opinion in the four related cases. Several provisions and requirements of the plan are in reality legislation which, it is believed, the Board has no authority to promulgate. In doing this, the Board of Education is making a calculated attempt to circumvent the exclusive right, power and duty of Congress to deal with this problem by legislation.

BLEED THROUGH

2. Because of local conditions in the District of Columbia, the Federation desires to suggest and urge that the terms of the decree to be entered by the Court should adequately protect the rights of all children of school age, and assure that no child of either color will be compelled, under penalty, to attend any specified school where the students of his own color constitute a disproportionate small minority. Also, the parents should be protected from the fines and/or imprisonments provided by the District of Columbia Code in that connection.

3. From all available information, the Federation understands that the petitioners, as well as the respondents, expect to take the general position in their final briefs, that integration of the District public schools is substantially an accomplished fact, and that the pending questions propounded by the Court are moot, or practically so. True, a plan of integrating the public schools was put into effect within a short time after May 17, 1954, and the plan has progressed to the point where the major part of it is in effect. In its brief, the Federation desires to call the Court's attention to some of the mandatory and compulsory requirements which constitute a part of that plan. Those compulsory provisions, it is believed, are most unreasonable and, in the light of the Court's opinion, they appear to be of doubtful validity to say the least. The Court has recognized and has emphasized the damaging effect upon colored school children which is produced by compulsory segregation of them. That proposition, like most others in life, has two sides. It is the desire of the Federation to deal briefly with the other side and to demonstrate why the terms of the decree should adequately protect children of all races against unnecessary damaging effects which will certainly arise as the result of compulsory integration if it be applied without any flexibility. As indicated previously, the Federation believes that coverage of this matter in the briefs of the petitioners and respondents is not contemplated. The importance of the matter would indicate a desirability for the Court to receive suggestions such as the Federation's brief will attempt to present.

The Federation respectfully and emphatically desires to point out to this Honorable Court that the case of the District of Columbia schools, as it stands, is defective through absence of a proper, not to say indispensable, party. One group of citizens is learnedly and expertly represented by counsel. The group of which the Federation is representative is thus far without a voice of its own. The Board of Education and its worthy counsel, of necessity, cannot speak the views of this group, as they necessarily differ in some vital respects from those common to all. Without the Federation this Court will not hear the voice of this great body of citizens of the District of Columbia.

Respectfully submitted,

No. 19–52

OLYMPIC RADIO AND TELEVISION, INC., PLAINTIFF

v.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, DEFENDANT

Petition

Filed January 14, 1952

To the Honorable, The Chief Judge and Judges of the United States Court of Claims:

The plaintiff, Olympic Radio and Television, Inc., respectfully represents and alleges:

1. The plaintiff is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of New York, having its office and principal place of business at 34–01 Thirty Eighth Avenue, Long Island City, New York. During the taxable year involved plaintiff was engaged in the manufacturing of television and radio receiving sets.

2. In this suit plaintiff seeks to recover from the United States the sum of $148,841.72, being income and excess profits taxes which were erroneously and illegally assessed and collected from 2 the plaintiff by the Collector of Internal Revenue for the Second Collection District of New York for the year 1944, and which was erroneously paid by the plaintiff to the said Collector. In addition, the plaintiff seeks to recover from the United States interest on such amount from the date of such payment and collection.

3. Plaintiff's claim to recover such amount and interest is founded upon the laws of the United States and particularly upon Section 122 of the Internal Revenue Code, and upon Title 28, United States Code, Section 2516. Jurisdiction of this action is vested in the Court of Claims by Title 28, United States Code, Section 1491.

4. Plaintiff kept its books and accounts on the accrual basis and filed its Federal corporation income and declared value excess profits tax returns and excess profits tax return on the same basis using a calendar year. Said returns for the year 1944 were filed on or about March 15, 1945, with the Collector of Internal Revenue for the Second Collection District of New York.

5. Plaintiff paid its excess profits tax liability for the year 1944 to the Collector of Internal Revenue for the Second Collection District of New York on the following dates and in the following amounts:

Date of payment	Amount of payment
Mar. 13, 1945	$173,181.81
June 5, 1945	173,181.81
Sept. 7, 1945	138,545.45
Dec. 15, 1945	138,545.45
Total	623,454.52

3 6. Plaintiff filed its Federal corporation income tax return for the calendar year 1946 with the Collector of Internal Revenue for the Second Collection District of New York on or about March 15, 1947. Said return as filed by the plaintiff for the year 1946 disclosed no income tax liability, and reflected a net operating loss for the year 1946 of $324,844.23.

7. Upon the audit of the plaintiff's income tax return for the year 1946, the Bureau of Internal Revenue reduced the net operating loss for the year 1946 to $310,872.60 to which the plaintiff agreed.

8. During the calendar year 1946 plaintiff paid a total of $263,272.80 in excess profits taxes as follows:

Date of payment	Amount of payment for calendar year 1945
Mar. 14, 1946	$86,660.81
June 15, 1946	86,660.81
Sept. 12, 1946	86,660.81
Dec. 12, 1946	3,290.37
Total	263,272.80

9. On or about June 11, 1948, plaintiff filed a claim for refund on Form 843 with the Bureau of Internal Revenue, being a claim for refund of income and excess profits taxes for the year 1944 erroneously and illegally assessed and collected by the Collector of Internal Revenue for the Second Collection District of New York in the amount of $191,004.04.

10. More than six months has elapsed since the filing on or 4 about June 11, 1948, of said refund claim, above referred to, during which time the Commissioner took no action with respect to the said claim for refund.

11. The refund claim, above referred to, was based upon the application of Section 122 (d) (6) of the Internal Revenue Code. The refund claim on said Form 843 was computed by adding to the agreed net operating loss for the year 1946 the sum of excess profits taxes actually paid by the plaintiff during 1946.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

12. Up until the time of the filing of this complaint, plaintiff has not received any portion of the amount claimed in said refund claim, nor has the plaintiff been credited in any manner for tax purposes or otherwise with any portion of the amount claimed in said refund claim.

13. The assessment and collection of excess profits tax for the year 1944 in the total amount of $148,841.72 was erroneous and illegal.

14. Plaintiff is the sole owner of the claim here asserted and has not made an assignment or transfer of said claim or any part thereof or interest therein.

Wherefore, the plaintiff prays, judgment for the total amount of at least $148,841.72 with interest thereon from the date of payment and such other and further relief to which it may appear the plaintiff is entitled.

11 of $262,272.80; that a copy of said refund claim above-referred to, together with the schedules and computations attached thereto, is attached to this Affidavit; that for the purposes of this proceeding the amount of refund claimed was computed as follows: the supplemental Revenue Agent's Report covering the Plaintiff's operations for the year 1944, dated March 31, 1948, reflected an adjusted net income for 1944 of $308,407.41, after allowance of net operating loss carry-back from 1946 of $310,872.60; the latter figure does not include any additions for excess profits taxes paid during 1946: the Plaintiff actually paid $263,272.80 in excess profits taxes during 1946; if the latter figure is added to the agreed net operating loss for 1946 of $310,872.60 and the aggregate of these two carried back to 1944, net income for 1944 is reduced to $45,134.61 and the adjusted excess profit net income becomes $61,172.43; because of the excess profits credit and unused excess profits credit carry-overs there would result an excess profits tax liability for 1944 of zero; that the remaining excess profits tax assessments (and payments) for the year 1944 not yet recovered by the Plaintiff by way of refund, all of which have been paid to the Collector of Internal Revenue, aggregate $148,841.72, which is the amount claimed as a refund in this proceeding, plus interest.

The deponent verily believes that this claim should be allowed for the following reasons:

The net operating loss for 1946 was not adjusted, as required under Section 122 (d) (6), for excess profits taxes paid or accrued during 1946. Taxpayer finally agreed to a deficiency in excess profits taxes (hence these taxes accrued in 1946) of $86,333.74. Moreover, taxpayer actually paid, in 1946, $306,072.41 in excess profits taxes.

15 Defendant's response to plaintiff's motion for summary judgment and defendant's cross motion for summary judgment

Filed August 12, 1952

Comes now the defendant by its Acting Assistant Attorney General and moves the Court to overrule the plaintiff's motion for summary judgment and to enter summary judgment against the plaintiff and in favor of the defendant in the above-entitled action because the pleadings and the evidence appended to the motions for summary judgment of the respective parties consisting of affidavits and exhibits show that there is no triable issue as to any material fact and that the defendant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.

In support of the within motion and in response to the 16 plaintiff's motion for summary judgment, the defendant will rely upon the pleadings and the evidence attached to the motions of the respective parties as well as the brief submitted herewith.

Respectfully submitted.

ELIZABETH B. DAVIS,
Attorney.

CITY OF WASHINGTON,
District of Columbia, ss:

Elizabeth B. Davis, being duly sworn, says:

1. I am an attorney in the Tax Division of the Department of Justice, assigned to duty at Washington, D. C., and that in my official capacity I am counsel of record for the United States, the defendant in a cause of action now pending in the United States Court of Claims, styled and numbered as follows: Olympic Radio and Television, Inc. v. United States, No. 19–52.

2. In my official capacity as counsel of record for the defendant I am at the present time the custodian of the administrative files of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, Treasury Department containing the information, papers and documents in the 17 possession of the defendant relating to the issues involved in the aforesaid proceeding.

3. I have examined the administrative files in my custody and as the result thereof state the following facts which I believe to be true:

(a) That the express profits tax return of the Hamilton Radio Corporation (now the Olympic Radio and Television, Inc.) for the calendar year 1945 showed an excess profits tax liability of $346,643.22.

(b) That of the amount of $346,643.22, payments in a total amount of $261,939.28 were made in 1946 and the remaining amount of $84,703.94 satisfied by credit.

(c) A deficiency of $42,799.61 in excess profits tax and $4,164.46 in interest was assessed on the November, 1947, list, of which $42,799.61 was abated on Schedule IT–CB–8061 (this is the schedule showing allowance of tentative carry-back adjustments), and the balance of $4,164.46 was credited on the same schedule. Additional interest of $38.16 and $789.38 was assessed on June 17, 1947, and April 19, 1948, lists, respectively, and was paid by credit.

(d) That there were carry-back allowances made from 1947 to 1945, resulting in overassessments of 1945 excess profits tax being allowed of $189,642.35 and $199,800.48, or a total overassessment allowed of $389,442.83. The amounts of these overassessments were either refunded or credited during the years 1947 and 1948.

OPINION ON PLAINTIFF'S AND DEFENDANT'S MOTIONS FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT

Decided November 4, 1952

WHITAKER, Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff sues for the recovery of $148,841.72 with interest asserting that the excess profits tax collected from it for the year 1944 was larger, by that amount, than it should have had to pay.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The plaintiff, a manufacturer of radio and television sets, paid in 1945 an excess profits tax on its 1944 profits in the total amount of $623,454.52. In 1946 it paid an excess profits tax of $263,272.80 on its 1945 profits. The plaintiff's return for 1946 showed no income tax liability, but instead a net operating loss of $324,844.23 reduced by the Bureau of Internal Revenue upon audit to $310,872.60. This operating loss for 1946, under the law, could be "carried back" to the year 1944. When this was done, it reduced the plaintiff's excess profits taxes for 1944 from the $623,454.52, which it had paid, to a considerably lesser sum. The amount of that reduction has been received by the plaintiff, by payment or credit. The plaintiff says, however, that to its net operating loss of $310,872.60 for 1946 there should have been added the $263,272.80 which it paid in 1946 on its 1945 excess profits, and that the sum of these two figures, instead of the first figure only, should have been carried back to reduce the 1944 excess profits net income. If that had been done, it would have reduced the 1944 excess profits tax by the amount claimed in this suit.

Section 122 of the Internal Revenue Code, which is entitled "Net Operating Loss Deduction" provides:

"(a) DEFINITION OF NET OPERATING LOSS.—As used in this section, the term net operating loss means the excess of the deductions allowed by this chapter over the gross income, with the exceptions, additions, and limitations provided in subsection (d).

* * * * *

"(d) EXCEPTIONS, ADDITIONS AND LIMITATIONS.—The exceptions, additions and limitations referred to in subsections (a) (b) and (c) shall be as follows:

* * * * *

"(6) There shall be allowed as a deduction the amount of tax imposed by Subchapter E of Chapter 2 paid or accrued within the taxable year."

Subchapter E of Chapter 2 is the part of the Code providing for excess profits taxes. Subsection (b) of Section 122 provides that if the taxpayer has a net operating loss for any taxable year, that net operating loss may be carried back to the two preceding taxable years, to reduce the income for those years.

The plaintiff, relying on the statutes referred to above, says that by Section 122 (d) (6) its excess profits tax paid in 1946 was includible in its "net operating loss" and therefore could be carried back to 1944, the second preceding taxable year, to reduce its income for that year. The Government says that these statutory provisions do not permit the plaintiff to do so, because the plaintiff was on the accrual basis for the computation of its income for tax purposes, and the tax which it desires to carry back, 23 though paid in 1946 when the plaintiff had a net operating loss, accrued in 1945 when it did not have a net operating loss, and would not have had such a loss even if this tax had been deducted from its 1945 income. The Government points to Section 43 of the Code which says:

"The deductions and credits * * * provided for in this chapter shall be taken for the taxable year in which "paid or accrued" or "paid or incurred," dependent upon the method of accounting upon the basis of which the net income is computed * * *."

Then it points to Section 23 which says:

DEDUCTIONS FROM GROSS INCOME

"In computing net income there shall be allowed as deductions:

"(s) * * * the net operating loss deduction computed under section 122."

Both Sections 43 and 23 are in Chapter 1 of the Code. Section 48 (c) also contains a definition similar to that of Section 43.

The statutory texts quoted above put a heavy burden on the plaintiff to show that it, being on the accrual basis for tax purposes, could take, in 1946, a deduction of excess profits taxes which accrued in 1945, though they were paid in 1946. The plaintiff's contention is that if the statutory definition of "paid or accrued" is applied to the excess profits tax situation, the deduction which the statute seems to tender to taxpayers is largely illusory, so far as taxpayers on the accrual basis of tax accounting are concerned. This would seem to be true, since it would be only rarely that a taxpayer would accrue a liability for an excess profits tax in a year in which it had a net operating loss.

According to the letter of the statutes, plaintiff is not entitled to deduct in the year 1946 taxes which accrued for the year 1945 but which were paid in 1946. When the statute referred to deductions "paid or accrued" in the taxable year, it referred to deductions paid in the taxable year if the taxpayer was on a cash basis, and to deductions accrued within the taxable year if the taxpayer was on the accrual basis. It is also true that in 24 computing one's income, either one basis or the other must be used, and that one cannot be used for certain deductions and the other for others.

Notwithstanding all this, we think that in order to give effect to the intention of Congress we must permit this taxpayer to deduct excess profits taxes paid in the calendar year 1946, although they accrued for the year 1945. We think so, for this reason: It was the clear intention of Congress that a taxpayer should be permitted to carry back to a former year his loss in a subsequent year, and that to this loss there should be added excess profits taxes "paid or accrued" in the calendar year.

BLEED THROUGH

Now, if we follow the letter of the statute, a taxpayer on an accrual basis would be denied the deduction of excess profits taxes, in practically all cases, if he is limited to the excess profits taxes accrued within the taxable year. There is rarely a case when a taxpayer would be liable for any excess profits tax in a year in which it had sustained a net operating loss; and, yet, Congress certainly intended that it should get the benefit of the deduction of excess profits taxes for some year. In order for it to get this deduction it would seem that it should be entitled to deduct the excess profits taxes which it paid in the taxable year, although they had accrued in the prior year.

It seems to us, therefore, that we must make an exception in this case to the general rule prohibiting the shifting from the "paid" to the "accrued" basis, or vice versa, in the case of specific deductions. Otherwise, we cannot give effect to the plain intention of Congress. We realize this does violence to the letter of the Act, but we are so thoroughly convinced of the intention of Congress that we feel justified in disregarding the letter in order to give effect to that intent. After all, it is the intention of Congress which we must enforce, however that intention may be divined.

No cases exactly in point have been cited to us nor have we found any; however, several of the Courts of Appeal have held that in applying the tax levied on undistributed net income, the expression "paid or accrued" need not be given its customary meaning.

In Birmingham, et al., v. The Loetscher Company, 188 F. 2d 78 (C. A. 8) the court held that a cash basis taxpayer could, under Section 505 (a) (1) of the Internal Revenue Code, deduct both taxes for a prior year paid within the taxable year and taxes accrued but not paid within the taxable year, in determining its undistributed net income for the purposes of the penalty tax on such net income. The court there relied on a holding in Commissioner v. Clarion Oil Company, 148 F. 2d 671, 80 U. S. App. D. C. 41, which, while it permitted a cash basis taxpayer to deduct taxes accrued but not paid within the tax year, refused to permit it to deduct taxes paid within the year but accrued in a prior year. In Aramo-Stiftung v. Commissioner, 172 F. 2d 896 (C. A. 2) the court permitted a cash basis taxpayer to deduct income taxes accrued but not paid within the taxable year, in determining its Section 505 (a) (1) taxable income. See also Wm. J. Lemp Brewing Company, 18 T. C. —, No. 70.

These cases support plaintiff's contention that the definitions of the term "paid or accrued" in sections 43 and 48 (c) should not be applied in all circumstances and regardless of consequences.

The Tax Court in Lewyt Corporation v. Commissioner, 18 T. C. ——, No. 151, has decided the question here involved adversely to plaintiff's contention. We regret that we are unable to agree.

Defendant's motion is denied, and plaintiff's motion for summary judgment is granted. Judgment will be entered in plaintiff's favor against the defendant in the amount of one hundred forty-eight thousand eight hundred forty-one dollars and seventy-two cents ($148,841.72), with interest as provided by law.

It is so ordered.

HOWELL, Judge; and LITTLETON, Judge, concur.

Madden, Judge, dissenting

I think the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. The Birmingham, Clarion Oil Company and Aramo-Stiftung cases, cited in the court's opinion, involved the penalty tax on undistributed profits. To penalize a corporation for not distributing as dividends money which it either does not have, because it pays it out in back taxes during the year, or which prudence would require it to keep, because it will be needed to pay taxes accrued during the year 26 though not payable until the following year, would seem to amount to penalizing sound management. The instant situation presents no comparable pressure of equity against the text of the statutes. The carry-back provision of the statutes does not permit the taxpayer to average its profit and loss experience for a five-year period. It only permits net operating losses, as determined by statutory provisions, to be carried back. To get the advantage of the statute, its requirements should be met. The Tax Court, in Lewyt Corporation v. Commissioner, 18 T. C. ——, No. 151, has decided the same question which is involved in our case, adversely to the plaintiff's contentions. I agree with its decision.

Chief Judge Jones agrees with this dissenting opinion.

27 Motion for the United States for rehearing

Filed Dec. 3, 1952

The United States, defendant herein, moves the Court for a rehearing in the above-entitled case for the following reasons:

1. This Court erred in ignoring the plain provisions of Sections 48 (c) and 122 (d) (6) of the Internal Revenue Code in allowing the plaintiff on the accrual basis to increase its net operating loss for 1946 by excess profits taxes which were paid in that year, but were not a proper accrual in that year.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

2. The Court erred in making an exception to the general rule, prohibiting the shifting from the "paid" to the "accrual"
28 basis, in order to give effect to what is considered the plain intention of Congress.

3. The Court erred in concluding that it was the intention of Congress to allow a taxpayer on the accrual basis to increase its net operating loss under Section 122 (d) (6) of the Internal Revenue Code by amounts which were not proper accruals in the year of the net operating loss.

4. The Court erred in granting plaintiff's motion for summary judgment and entering judgment for the plaintiff.

Wherefore, the defendant prays that this motion be set for oral argument; that defendant's motion be granted for the reasons set forth above and also in a brief attached hereto; and that judgment be entered in favor of the defendant.

Respectfully submitted.

Assistant Attorney General.

ELIZABETH B. DAVIS,
Attorney.

28A Motion for the plaintiff in opposition to the motion for the United States for rehearing

Comes now the plaintiff, through its counsel of record, and respectfully moves this Court to grant this Motion and to deny the defendant's Motion for Rehearing for the following reasons:

1. The Opinion of this Court in the subject proceeding was correct as a matter of law.

2. This Court did not err as alleged in the defendant's Motion.

3. The single issue presented in this proceeding involves a question of law and all facts were either admitted in the pleadings or covered by unopposed affidavits.

4. The defendant had, prior to the filing of defendant's Motion for Rehearing, an opportunity for arguing the issue of law 28B here involved in open Couht and filed a brief in support thereof. The defendant's Brief in Support of this Motion fails to advance any significantly new and different arguments from those already presented to this Court, hence no good purpose would be served by setting this proceeding for reargument.

Wherefore, the plaintiff respectfully prays that this Motion be granted for the reasons set forth in the plaintiff's briefs as heretofore filed, for the reasons set forth in this Court's Opinion as well as for the reasons set forth in the Brief attached hereto; that the defendant's Motion for Rehearing and for oral argument be denied and that this Court's Judgment in this proceeding remain as entered.

Respectfully submitted.

29 Argument and submission of case

On motion for rehearing

February 3, 1953

On February 3, 1953, the case was argued and submitted on Defendant's motion for rehearing by Mrs. Elizabeth B. Davis for Defendant, and by Mr. Frederick R. Tansill for plaintiff.

31 Opinion of the Court on defendant's motion for rehearing by Whitaker, J.; Madden, J., and Jones, Ch. J. adhere to the views expressed in their former dissenting opinion

Decided March 3, 1953

Mr. Frederick R. Tansill for the plaintiff. Mr. Eugene Meacham was on the briefs.

Mrs. Elizabeth B. Davis, with whom was Mr. Acting Assistant Attorney General Ellis N. Slack, for the defendant. Mr. Andrew D. Sharpe was on the briefs.

WHITAKER, Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

In our opinion on plaintiff's and defendant's motions for summary judgment filed November 4, 1952, we held that the words "paid or accrued" in section 122 (d) (6) of the Internal Revenue Code must be construed as permitting a deduction for excess profits taxes paid in the taxable year in which a loss had been sustained, although the taxpayer filed its returns on an accrual basis; and we accordingly granted plaintiff's motion for a summary judgment.

Defendant has now filed a motion for a rehearing in which it presents a persuasive argument that our decision is wrong, but after careful consideration of defendant's motion and the authorities cited, we adhere to our former opinion.

However, defendant in its motion for a rehearing calls our attention to the provisions of sections 711 (a) (1) and 711 (a) (2) of the Revenue Act of 1940 (54 Stat. 976), to which subsections (J) and (L) were added by sections 210 (a) and 210 (b)

BLEED THROUGH

of the Revenue Act of 1942 (56 Stat. 907 and 908), which read in part as follows:

32 EXCESS PROFITS NET INCOME

"(a) TAXABLE YEARS BEGINNING AFTER DECEMBER 31, 1939.—The excess profits net income for any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1939, shall be the normal-tax net income, as defined in section 13 (a) (2), for such year except that the following adjustments shall be made:

"(1) EXCESS PROFITS CREDIT COMPUTED UNDER INCOME CREDIT.—If the excess profits credit is computed under section 713, the adjustments shall be as follows:

* * * * *

"(J) NET OPERATING LOSS DEDUCTION ADJUSTMENT.—The net operating loss deduction shall be adjusted as follows:

"(i) In computing the net operating loss for any taxable year under section 122 (a), and the net income for any taxable year under section 122 (b), no deduction shall be allowed for any excess profits tax imposed by this subchapter, * * *.

"(2) EXCESS PROFITS CREDIT COMPUTED UNDER INVESTED CAPITAL CREDIT.—If the excess profits credit is computed under section 714, the adjustments shall be as follows:

"(L) NET OPERATING LOSS DEDUCTION ADJUSTMENT.—The net operating loss deduction shall be adjusted as follows:

"(i) In computing the net operating loss for any taxable year under section 122 (a), and the net income for any taxable year under section 122 (b), no deduction shall be allowed for any excess profits tax imposed by this subchapter, * * *."

In computing the credit which the Act allows to be taken against excess profits net income, subsections (J) and (L) plainly forbid the deduction of the excess profits taxes in question in this case, whether or not they were paid or accrued within the taxable year.

Section 122 (d) (6) of the Internal Revenue Code permits a deduction of excess profits taxes paid or accrued within the taxable year in computing the net operating loss deduction, but when a taxpayer comes to compute his excess profits credit against excess profits net income, he is denied this deduction. The result is that the deduction allowed by section 122 (d) (6) can be used only in the computation of the ordinary corporate income 33 tax and the corporation surtax net income, but it cannot be used in the computation of the excess profits tax.

Plaintiff seems to admit that this is correct where the excess profits tax is computed under section 710 (a) (1) (A) of the Revenue Act of 1942, but it says that it is not correct when the excess profits tax is computed under section 710 (a) (1) (B) of the Revenue Act of 1942.

Section 710 (a) (1) provides that the excess profits tax shall be the lesser sum computed under subsection (A) and subsection (B). Subsection (A) provides for a tax of 90 per centum of the adjusted excess profits net income, increased to 95 per centum by the Revenue Act of 1943. Subsection (B) provides for a tax which shall be "an amount which when added to the tax imposed for the taxable year under Chapter 1 (other than section 102) equals 80 per centum of the corporation surtax net income, * * *."

Plaintiff says that when it computed its tax under subsection (B), it arrived at a figure which was less than that computed under subsection (A), and, therefore, that the tax to be demanded of it as a tax computed under subsection (B); and then it says that in computing the excess profits tax under subsection (B) it is not prohibited from deducting the excess profits taxes paid or accrued in another year in which it had sustained a loss.

We think this position is sound.

Section 711 (a) provides that the excess profits net income, upon which the excess profits tax is levied, shall be the normal tax net income with the following adjustments:

"If the excess profits credit is computed under section 713, the adjustments shall be as follows: * * * [subsection (1)]."

Subsection (J) (i) provides for the "net operating loss deduction adjustment." It says, "The net operating loss deduction shall be adjusted as follows:"

"(i) In computing the net operating loss for any taxable year under section 122 (a), and the net income for any taxable year under section 122 (b), no deduction shall be allowed for any excess profits tax imposed by this subchapter, * * *."

34 The same restriction is made if the excess profits credit is computed under section 714.

Therefore, when a taxpayer goes to compute his excess profits tax under section 710 (a) (1) (A) he cannot take credit for "any excess profits tax imposed by this subchapter"; and he must pay 95 per centum of his excess profits net income, less the adjustments allowed, which exclude an adjustment for excess profits taxes paid in another year.

However, section 710 (a) (1) provides that if the amount of the excess profits tax computed under subsection (A) is greater than the amount computed under subsection (B), then the taxpayer is required to pay only the amount computed under subsection (B).

So, the taxpayer proceeds to compute its excess profits tax under subsection (B). This subsection provides that the tax is "an amount which when added to the tax imposed for the taxable year under Chapter 1 (other than section 102) equals 80 per centum of the corporation surtax net income, computed under section 15 or supplement G, as the case may be, but without regard to the credit provided in section 26 (e) (relating to income subject to the tax imposed by this subchapter)."

BLEED THROUGH

It will be seen that in computing the tax under subsection (B), the taxpayer is not concerned with its adjusted excess profits net income. What it is concerned with is the tax imposed under Chapter 1, which is the normal corporation tax and the corporation surtax net income. This subsection says that the excess profits tax, as computed under it, is the difference between 80 per centum of the corporation surtax net income and the normal corporation income tax.

When computing the tax under subsection (B), no regard is to be had to the excess profits net income, but only to the ordinary net income and the corporation surtax net income. No one denies that in computing the ordinary net income that the taxpayer is permitted to carry back or forward the net operating loss in another year, which net operating loss includes a deduction for the excess profits tax paid or accrued within the taxable year in which there was a loss. This is also true in the computation of the surtax net income.

Section 711 (a) relates alone to the computation of the ex-35 cess profits net income; it does not relate to the computation of the ordinary corporate net income nor to the surtax net income; hence, the prohibition therein contained against the deduction of excess profits taxes in a year in which a loss was sustained does not apply when a corporation is computing its ordinary net income or its surtax net income.

Therefore, inasmuch as this taxpayer's tax was computed under section 710 (a) (1) (B) of the Revenue Act of 1942, and since the tax imposed by this section is not based on excess profits net income, the limitation imposed by subdivision (J) (i) of section 711 (a) (1) and subdivision (L) (i) of section 711 (a) (2) is not applicable.

It results that the judgment heretofore entered in the sum of $148,841.72 will stand.

HOWELL, Judge, and LITTLETON, Judge, concur.

MADDEN, Judge, and JONES, Chief Judge, adhere to the views expressed in their former dissenting opinion.

No. ~~839~~ 100

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, PETITIONER

v.

OLYMPIC RADIO AND TELEVISION, INC.

PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF CLAIMS

The Acting Solicitor General, on behalf of the United States, prays that a writ of certiorari issue to review the judgment of the Court of Claims entered in this case on November 4, 1952, rehearing denied, March 3, 1953.

OPINIONS BELOW

The original opinion of the Court of Claims (R. 10–14) and the dissenting opinion, entered November 4, 1952, are reported in 108 F. Supp. 109. The opinion on rehearing (R. 16–19), entered March 3, 1953, is reported in 110 F. Supp. 600.

JURISDICTION

The opinion and judgment of the Court of Claims were entered November 4, 1952. (R. 14.) On December 3, 1952, the Government filed a motion for rehearing. On March 3, 1953, the court denied the motion. (R. 19.) The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under 28 U. S. C., Section 1255 (1).

QUESTION PRESENTED

Whether, under Section 122 (d) (6) of the Internal Revenue Code, a taxpayer on the accrual basis can, in computing its net operating loss for one year, deduct the amount of excess profits taxes paid in that year but which accrued in an earlier year.

STATUTE INVOLVED

The applicable portions of the pertinent statute are set forth in the Appendix, infra, pp. 12–18.

STATEMENT

This case was submitted to the court below on motions for summary judgments filed by both parties, together with supporting affidavits. The facts, which are not in dispute, are briefly as follows:

Taxpayer, a corporation, keeps its books and accounts and files its income tax returns on the accrual basis. (R. 1.) Its income tax return for the year 1946 disclosed no income tax liability and reflected a net operating loss of $324,844.23. (R. 2.) Upon the audit of the taxpayer's income tax return for the year 1946, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue reduced the net operating loss for the year 1946 to $310,872.60. (R. 2.) Taxpayer, in its excess profits return for the year 1945, reported an excess profits tax liability of $346,643.22. Of this amount $263,272.80 was paid in 1946. (R. 2.)

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Taxpayer duly filed a claim for refund of income and excess profits taxes for the year 1944 in the amount of $191,004.04. This claim was based on the ground that the excess profits taxes for 1945 paid during 1946 should be added to the agreed net operating loss for 1946 under Section 122 (d) (6) of the Internal Revenue Code. The amount of $263,272.80, the excess profits tax for 1945, paid in 1946, was later refunded or credited to the taxpayer, as a result of the allowance of carry-backs for 1947. (R. 10.)

The Court of Claims (Madden, J., with whom Jones, C. J., concurred, dissenting) held that, in computing its net operating loss for 1946, the taxpayer was entitled to deduct the amount of the excess profits taxes shown on its 1945 return and paid in 1946. The court entered judgment in favor of the taxpayer in the amount of $148,841.72, with interest. (R. 14.)

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT

1. As the Court of Claims expressly recognized (R. 14), its decision, allowing an accrual basis taxpayer to increase its net operating loss by the amount of an earlier-accrued excess profits tax actually paid in the taxable year, is in direct conflict with that of the full Tax Court, rendered without dissent, in Lewyt Corp. v. Commissioner, 18 T. C. 1245. See, also, W. L. Maxson Corp. v. Commissioner, decided January 26, 1953 (1953 P–H T. C. Memorandum Decisions, par. 53,021). And see Estate of Byrne v. Commissioner, 16 T. C. 1234, deciding the same issue in favor of the Government without extended discussion.

In the Lewyt case, the Tax Court held (18 T. C. at 1249–1253), in square conflict with the decision below, that an accrual basis taxpayer cannot, under Code Section 122 (d) (6) [1] (Appendix, infra, p. 14), increase its net operating loss for a particular year for carryback purposes by the excess profits tax which was paid in that year but which accrued in a prior year. The basis for the decision of the Tax Court was that, while Section 122 (d) (6) allows as a deduction the excess profits tax "paid or accrued within the taxable year," the alternative verbs "paid or accrued" were used to comprehend, and distinguish between, taxpayers on a cash or accrual basis (i. e., "paid," if on [1] Section 122 (a) of the Code defines the "net operating loss", which may be carried back to and be deducted in two previous years under Code Sections 23 (s) and 122 (b) (1) and (c) (Appendix, infra, pp. 12, 13–14), as the excess of the deductions "allowed by this chapter", i. e., the chapter imposing the income tax, over the gross income, with the exceptions, additions, and limitations provided in subsection (d). Section 122 (d) (6) provides that there shall be allowed as a deduction the amount of tax imposed by Subchapter E of Chapter 2, i. e., the excess profits tax, "paid or accrued within the taxable year." Section 48 (c) (Appendix infra, p. 13) provides that when used in this chapter, i. e., the chapter imposing the income tax and the chapter containing Section 122 (d) (6), the term "paid or accrued" shall be construed according to the method of accounting upon the basis of which the net income is computed, and Section 43 (Appendix, infra, pp. 12–13) provides that the deductions provided for in this chapter, i. e., the income tax chapter containing Section 122 (d) (6), shall be taken for the taxable year in which "paid or accrued", dependent upon the method of accounting on the basis of which net income is computed.

cash basis, and "accrued," if on accrual basis), and were not designed to give an accrual basis taxpayer the right to deduct its excess profits tax in the year paid, if the tax accrued in another year.[2] See Code Sections 43 and 48 (c) (Appendix, infra, pp. 12–13), and see footnote 1, supra. This conflict between the Court of Claims and the Tax Court on a question of such recurrent importance in the administration of the tax laws would seem to require resolution by this Court at this time.[3] We are informed by the Department of the Treasury that the same issue is presented in at least 35 (and probably more) other cases now pending before the Court of Claims, the district courts, the Tax Court, and the Treasury, involving a total of at least $27,000,000 in taxes, plus interest. Other taxpayers will doubtless raise the same question in other cases.[4]

[2] The holding that the term "paid or accrued" in Section 122 (d) (6) refers to the accounting method employed in computing income was reaffirmed in Robert Reis & Co. v. Commissioner, 20 T. C. No. 36. The Reis case involved a situation where the liability for the excess profits tax was contested. It was held that the tax did not "accrue" in the year for which it was incurred, but that it accrued when the contest was settled and the tax was paid, under Dixie Pine Co. v. Commissioner, 320 U. S. 516.

[3] The Court's decision in the Lewyt case was entered April 9, 1953, and final decision has not yet been entered in the Maxson case. Thus, the time within which to file appeals to the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, the reviewing court for those cases, has not yet expired, and we understand the taxpayers will appeal.

[4] Even though the excess profits tax was repealed for years ending after December 31, 1945 (Sec. 122 (a), Revenue Act of 1945, c. 453, 59 Stat. 556), the statutory period for filing

2. The decision of the Court of Claims departs from the principle, established in numerous decisions of this Court, that a taxpayer on the accrual basis must take deductions in the year in which they accrue, regardless of when paid. United States v. Anderson, 269 U. S. 422; Niles Bement Pond Co. v. United States, 281 U. S. 357; Aluminum Castings Co. v. Routzahn, 282 U. S. 92; Security Mills Co. v. Commissioner, 321 U. S. 281. Cf. Dixie Pine Co. v. Commissioner, 320 U. S. 516. Furthermore, the court below recognized that the clear language of the statute (Secs. 43, 48 (c) and 122 (d) (6) (see fn. 2, supra)), forbids an accrual basis taxpayer to deduct in one year excess profits taxes paid in that year but which accrued in an earlier year (R. 12). Nevertheless the court thought that it should read an exception into the statute and permit the claimed deduction in order to give effect to what it believed claims for net operating loss deductions does not expire until 39 months after the end of the taxable year of the net operating loss (Sec. 322 (b) (6), Internal Revenue Code (26 U. S. C. 1946 ed., Sec. 322)). It is probable also that in a number of instances waivers have been filed which will extend the statutory period. (Sec. 322 (b) (3), Internal Revenue Code.) Moreover, since Section 122 (d) (6) applies in connection with determination of net operating losses up to and including the year ended June 30, 1950 (Sec. 304, Excess Profits Tax Act of 1950, c. 1199, 64 Stat. 1137), the same issue can arise for all years prior to that date where the liability for excess profits taxes for years prior to 1946 was being contested and the taxes were accordingly not paid or accrued until a later year when the contest was settled. In Robert Reis & Co. v. Commissioner, supra, n. 2, the loss year was 1949.

was the intention of Congress (R. 13).[5] It reasoned that Congress must have intended that an accrual basis taxpayer should be allowed to deduct excess profits taxes paid but not accrued in the tax year in determining its net operating loss for that year because, otherwise, an accrual basis taxpayer would be denied the benefit of deducting excess profits taxes "in practically all cases", the court assuming that only rarely would excess profits taxes accrue in a year when an operating loss was sustained. (R. 13.) Even if the court were correct in its assumption, that could not justify disregard of the plain language of the statute.[6] As this Court recently

[5] Birmingham v. Loetscher Co., 188 F. 2d 78 (C. A. 8); Aramo-Stiftung v. Commissioner, 172 F. 2d 896 (C. A. 2); and Commissioner v. Clarion Oil Co., 148 F. 2d 671 (C. A. D. C.), certiorari denied, 325 U. S. 881, construing the words "paid or accrued" as used in Section 505 (a) of the Internal Revenue Code (26 U. S. C. 1946 ed., Sec. 505), dealing with the penalty surtax on the undistributed profits of personal holding companies, furnish no support for the decision of the majority of the court below. See dissenting opinion of Judge Madden (R. 14) and the opinion of the Tax Court in Lewyt Corp. v. Commissioner, 18 T. C. 1245, 1252.

[6] If the principle of Dixie Pine Co. v. Commissioner, 320 U. S. 516, is applicable to federal income and excess profits taxes, an accrual basis taxpayer would get the benefits of this section where taxes for prior years were contested and not settled until the loss year. Although the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has recently taken the position before the Tax Court that the Dixie Pine Co. case is not governing with respect to federal income or excess profits taxes and that such tax "accrues" in the accounting period for which levied, this position was rejected in the recent case of Robert Reis & Co. v. Commissioner, 20 T. C. No. 36. The court also pointed out in that case that its holding therein, allowing an accrual reiterated, provisions of tax law cannot be bent in particular cases in order to avoid "hardship" to the taxpayer or the Government. Healy v. Commissioner, 345 U. S. 278, 284–285. And see Riley Co. v. Commissioner, 311 U. S. 55, 59; United States v. Hill, 248 U. S. 420; Commissioner v. Hecht Co., 163 F. 2d 194 (C. A. 4); and Sabine Transp. Co. v. Commissioner 128 F. 2d 945, 947 (C. A. 5); cf. Helvering v. Twin Bell Syndicate, 293 U. S. 312, 321.

As the Court stated in Crooks v. Harrelson, 282 U. S. 55, 60, to justify a court's departure from the terms of the statute "there must be something to make plain the intent of Congress that the letter of the statute is not to prevail." The Court of Claims here did not, and indeed could not, rely upon any legislative history to support its assumptions as to the "intent" of Congress. (See the Tax Court's discussion of the legislative history in Lewyt Corp. v. Commissioner, 18 T. C. 1245, 1251–1252). As Judge Madden stated in his dissenting opinion, to get the advantage of a net operating loss granted by the statute, the statute's "requirements should be met."[7] basis taxpayer to deduct, in computing its net operating loss for 1949, excess profits taxes for 1943 and 1944 which were in dispute and not settled until 1949, refutes a contention made by the taxpayer in the Lewyt case, supra, that to construe "paid or accrued" as used in Section 122 (d) (6) as referring to the taxpayer's method of accounting would deny accrual basis taxpayers any benefit under the section.

[7] In its motion for rehearing the Government again pointed out to the court below that its decision was inconsistent with Section 711 (a) (1) (J) and (a) (2) (L) of the Internal Revenue Code, which provides, for purposes of adjusting the excess profits net income, that in computing the net operating loss for

(R. 14.) Cf. Reo Motors v. Commissioner, 338 U. S. 442; Standard Paving Co. v. Commissioner, 190 F. 2d 330 (C. A. 10).

Furthermore, the court erred in rejecting the Government's contention that, since the excess profits taxes for 1945, which were claimed as a deduction in 1946 in computing the net operating loss, were later refunded or credited in full as a result of a net operating loss carry-back from 1947, the taxpayer did not suffer any real economic loss and was therefore not entitled to increase its operating loss deduction by a tax liability which was eliminated. The purpose of Section 122 (d) was to prevent "net losses from being used as a deduction by the taxpayer where he is not suffering any economic loss."

any taxable year under Section 122 (a) and 122 (d) (6) (Appendix, infra, pp. 13, 14–15), "no deduction shall be allowed for any excess profits tax imposed by this chapter." The court below rejected that contention in its opinion on rehearing (R.19). The effect is to allow all excess profits, taxes, both paid and accrued, to be deducted in arriving at the net operating loss to be carried back for income tax purposes, but not to allow any excess profit taxes to be deducted in arriving at the net operating loss to be carried back for excess profits tax purposes—a result which would seem inconsistent with any probable Congressional intention. Further, the court below erred in holding that Section 711 (a) (1) (J) and (a) (2) (L) do not apply even if taxpayer's excess profits tax liability for 1944 is to be determined under Section 710 (a) (1) (B). This result requires that the net operating loss for purpose of the two alternative computations of the excess profits tax be calculated in two different ways, again a highly improbable result. Compare Sokol Bros. Furniture Co. v. Commissioner, 185 F. 2d 222 (C. A. 5), certiorari denied, 340 U. S. 952, with Basalt Rock Co. v. Commissioner, 180 F. 2d 281 (C. A. 9), certiorari denied, 339 U. S. 966.

H. Rep. No. 855, 76th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 17 (1939–2 Cum. Bull. 504, 517). The taxpayer clearly should not be allowed to use the amount of excess profits taxes for 1945, which were paid but later refunded, to increase in a fictitious amount a net operating loss to be carried back to an earlier year.[8]

3. The decision below, if allowed to stand, may lead to completely anomalous consequences. Under it all taxpayers, whether on the cash or accrual basis of accounting, would appear to be able to deduct all excess profits taxes, both paid and accrued within any taxable year, for purposes of determining their net operating losses.[9] The decision could also result in allowing the excess profits taxes paid for a particular year to be used as a carry-back to wipe out or reduce the excess profits tax liability for that year. For example, if the net operating loss for 1946 here, resulting from the allowance of a deduction of the 1945 excess profits taxes, exceeded the 1944 net income after necessary adjustments under Section 122 (d), the excess would be a carry-over to 1945 under Section 122 (b) (1) (Appendix, infra, pp. 13–14) and would be claimed as a deduction against the excess profits tax liability for 1945.[10] Thus, the 1945 excess profits taxes would be a factor in wiping out or reducing the very liability which they were paid to satisfy. Certainly, such incongruous results could not have been intended by Congress.

[8] Cf. Arrowsmith v. Commissioner, 344 U. S. 6, where this Court, in determining the nature of a transaction which took place in 1944, considered events occurring in later years.

[9] In Ohio Boxboard Co. v. Carey, Civil No. 28356, now pending in the District Court for the Northern District of Ohio, a taxpayer with a net income for 1944 of $1,740,718.29 as determined by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, is claiming the right to deduct 1943 excess profits taxes paid in 1944 of approximately $1,000,000 and also to deduct 1944 excess profits taxes accrued in that year of approximately $1,000,000, thus resulting in a claimed net loss of over $400,000.

CONCLUSION

This petition for a writ of certiorari should be granted.

Respectfully submitted.

ROBERT L. STERN,
Acting Solicitor General.

[10] Such a claim was made in the Lewyt case before the Tax Court, but in view of that court's holding that the excess profits taxes were not deductible in computing the net operating loss deduction, the basis for the claim was eliminated.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, PETITIONER

v.

OLYMPIC RADIO AND TELEVISION, INC.

ON PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF CLAIMS

MEMORANDUM IN REPLY TO RESPONDENT'S BRIEF IN OPPOSITION

Respondent's brief in opposition contends that the petition for a writ of certiorari was not filed within the statutory period. The principal basis for this contention is this Court's decision in Federal Trade Commission v. Minneapolis Honeywell Regulator Co., 344 U. S. 206. That case, however, is wholly inapposite.

The opinion and judgment of the Court of Claims were entered November 4, 1952. (R. 14.) On December 3, 1952, within 30 days of the entry of the original judgment, the Government filed a motion for rehearing. This motion was timely filed. Rule 53 (c) of the Court of Claims. On March 3, 1953, the court denied the motion with an opinion. (R. 19.) The petition for a writ of certiorari was filed May 29, 1953.

Respondent contends that, inasmuch as the Court of Claims did not vary the terms of the November 4 judgment when it denied the motion for rehearing, the time within which the petition for writ of certiorari could be filed began to run on November 4 and expired February 2, 1953. It is urged, therefore, that under Minneapolis Honeywell the petition is out of time.

But Minneapolis Honeywell did not deal with a timely motion for rehearing in the court below (cf. Federal Power Commission v. Idaho Power Co., 344 U. S. 17, 19–20, n. 1, p. 21), and did not purport to change the long established rule that timely motions for rehearing toll the time for filing a petition for certiorari until 90 days after the disposition of the rehearing motion. Department of Banking v. Pink, 317 U. S. 264, 266; Pfister v. Northern Illinois Finance Corp., 317 U. S. 144, 149–150; Morse v. United States, 270 U. S. 151; cf. Wayne United Gas Co. v. Owens-Illinois Glass Co., 300 U. S. 131, 137. Here, where the motion for rehearing was timely filed in the Court of Claims, the 90 day period did not commence until the decision of that court on March 3, 1953, and did not expire until June 1, 1953. As the petition for certiorari was filed May 29, it was timely.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The petitioner, Federal Trade Commission, in the Minneapolis Honeywell case attempted to sustain the timeliness of the petition for a writ of certiorari on two well settled rules: (1) that when a court considers on its merits an untimely petition for a rehearing, or an untimely motion to amend matters of substance in a judgment, the time for appeal may begin to run anew from the date on which the court disposed of the untimely petition, and (2) that when a court actually changes its judgment, the time to appeal or petition begins to run anew irrespective of whether a petition for rehearing has been filed. This Court's decision did not question the correctness of these two general propositions but held them to be inapplicable to the facts of that case. Reliance upon the first proposition was held by this Court to be misplaced because the untimely memorandum filed by the Federal Trade Commission in the Court of Appeals neither sought a rehearing nor an amendment of the previous judgment in respect to the one matter controverted in the Court of Appeals and decided by the Court of Appeals in the first judgment. The second proposition was held inapplicable because the later judgment entered by the Court of Appeals reiterated, without change, everything which had been decided in the earlier judgment on the one controverted matter. Here, on the other hand, the motion for rehearing was timely filed; it was directed specifically to the matter now in controversy in this Court; it was argued orally before the court; it was fully considered by the court on its merits and disposed of by a supplemental opinion; and the petition for writ of certiorari is directed toward precisely the same judgment as to which the motion for rehearing was denied.

The petition for a writ of certiorari was timely filed.

Respectfully submitted.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, PETITIONER

v.

OLYMPIC RADIO AND TELEVISION, INC.

SUPPLEMENTAL MEMORANDUM FOR THE UNITED STATES

In its petition for certiorari the United States noted (Pet. 3-5) that the decision of the Court of Claims in this case is in direct conflict with that of the Tax Court in Lewyt Corp. v. Commissioner, 18 T. C. 1245, and that the Court of Claims expressly recognized the conflict (R. 14). On July 14, 1954, the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit affirmed the decision of the Tax Court in the Lewyt case. The Second Circuit took notice of the contrary decision of the Court of Claims in the instant case, but declined to follow it. Its opinion, which is set out in full in the Appendix, infra, states (p. 21):

> Finally, on this point the taxpayer gives us the decision of the Court of Claims in Olympic Radio and Television, Inc. v. United States, 108 F. Supp. 109 (1952), re-hearing denied 110 F. Supp. 600 (1953), which squarely upholds the position of the taxpayer as to the meaning of "paid or accrued" in § 122(d)(6). We have given careful and respectful consideration to the two opinions of the majority in that case, which were based largely on the same considerations urged upon us by the taxpayer here, and find ourselves unable to agree with the Court of Claims.

On August 24, 1954, the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit denied per curiam, without opinion, a petition for rehearing in the Lewyt case.

Respectfully submitted,

COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE, RESPONDENT

Before: CLARK, HINCKS and HARLAN, CIRCUIT JUDGES

Petition to review a decision of the Tax Court determining a deficiency in petitioner's income taxes for the taxable year ended September 30, 1944, and a deficiency in excess profits taxes for the taxable year ended September 30, 1945. Tietjens, Judge. Affirmed.

H. Brian Holland, Assistant Attorney General (Ellis N. Slack, Lee A. Jackson, and I. Henry Kutz, Special Assistants to the Attorney General, of Counsel) for the respondent.

HARLAN, Circuit Judge:

We are asked to review a decision of the Tax Court determining a deficiency of $7,129.21 in petitioner's income tax for the taxable year ended September 30, 1944, and a deficiency of $446,557.19 in excess profits tax for the taxable year ended September 30, 1945. The taxpayer is a New York corporation engaged in the manufacture of vacuum cleaners and electronic devices. For tax purposes it used a fiscal year ending each September 30 and reported on an accrual basis. Each fiscal year referred to in this opinion will be designated simply by the calendar year in which it ended.

In the two years in question § 23(s) of the Internal Revenue Code [26 U. S. C. A. § 23(s)] provided that in computing net income there should be allowed as a deduction (from gross income) the "net operating loss deduction" provided in § 122 (26 U. S. C. A. §122). Section 122(a) defines "net operating loss" as "the excess of the deductions allowed by this chapter over the gross income, with the exceptions, additions, and limitations provided in subsection (d)." We are not concerned here with any of the provisions of subsection (d) except that contained in (d) (6) which permits the deduction of taxes "imposed by Subchapter E of Chapter 2 [excess profits taxes] paid or accrued within the taxable year," subject to certain rules not presently relevant. If a taxpayer has a net operating loss for a given taxable year, § 122(b)(1) and (2) and § 122(c) [1] provide that it may be ap-loss carry-back for each of the two preceding taxable years, except that the carry-back in the case of the first preceding taxable year shall be the excess, if any, of the amount of such net operating loss over the net income for the second preceding taxable year computed (A) with the exceptions, additions, and limitations provided in subsection (d) (1), (2), (4), and (6), and (B) by determining the net operating loss deduction for such second preceding taxable year without regard to such net operating loss.

(2) Net operating loss carry-over. If for any taxable year the taxpayer has a net operating loss, such net operating loss shall be a net operating loss carry-over for each of the two succeeding taxable years, except that the carry-over in the case of the second succeeding taxable year shall be the excess,, if any, of the amount of such net operating loss over the net income for the intervening taxable year computed (A) with the exceptions, additions, and limitations provided in subsection (d) (1), (2), (4), and (6), and (B) by determining the net operating loss deduction for such intervening taxable year without regard to such net operating loss and without regard to any net operating loss carry-back. For the purposes of the preceding sentence, the net operating loss for any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1941 shall be reduced by the sum of the net income for each of the two preceding taxable years (computed for each such preceding taxable year with the exceptions, additions, and limitations provided in subsection (d) (1), (2), (4), and (6), and computed by determining the net operating loss deduction without regard to such net operating loss or to the net operating loss for the succeeding taxable year).

(c) Amount of net operating loss deduction. The amount of the net operating loss deduction shall be the aggregate of the net operating loss carry-overs and of the net operating loss carry-backs to the taxable year reduced by the amount, if any, by which the net income (computed with the exceptions and limitations provided in subsection (d) (1), (2), (3), and being carried successively, until exhausted, into the subsequent years ending with the taxable year secondly succeeding the year in which the net operating loss occurred.

The taxpayer had net operating losses in each of the years 1946 and 1947, and the dispute we have before us relates primarily to (a) the proper computation of such losses for each of those years, and (b) the application of such losses to the years 1944 and 1945, in each of which the taxpayer had substantial taxable net income.

We come first to the questions relating to the year 1945 in respect of which the Tax Court sustained the determination of the Commissioner that there was a deficiency in excess profits taxes of more than $460,000.

The Commissioner determined that in 1947 the taxpayer had a net operating loss of $786,383.25, which he allowed as a "carry-back" deduction to 1945. The taxpayer claimed additional "carry-backs" to 1945 aggregating $1,381,402.33 by reason of (a) the remittance to the Collector in 1947 of $300,008.87 in respect of excess profits taxes for the years 1943, 1944, and 1945 which, it is asserted, should have been added to the net operating loss for 1947; (b) the remittance to the Collector in 1947 of $55,949.04 interest on the foregoing amount and on some $12,000 of additional income taxes for 1943, which, it is claimed, should also have been added to the 1947 net operating loss; and (c) the failure to allow any portion of the net operating loss for 1946, claimed to be $1,025,444.42, as a "carry-back" to 1945. Each of these claims was denied by the Commissioner, who was sustained by the Tax Court. The taxpayer also contends that the Tax Court erred in failing to credit on the asserted excess profits tax deficiency for 1945 the sum of $108,437.36, which the taxpayer remitted to the Commissioner in 1947 in respect of 1945 excess profits taxes (this amount being part of the $300,008.87 referred to above).

These remittances aggregating $300,008.87 were made under the following circumstances:

Prior to 1947, a dispute arose between the taxpayer and the Collector as to the taxpayer's 1943 tax liability. On August 30, 1946, the Collector issued a statutory notice asserting income and excess profits tax deficiencies for 1943 in the amount of $7,757.49 and $194,992.51, respectively. The taxpayer objected to these deficiencies and took the matter to the Tax Court. Meanwhile, settlement negotiations were opened. On September 29, 1947, the taxpayer's auditor, believing that a formula for settlement had been reached, recomputed the tax liability for 1943 and sent the Collector a check for $190,002.16, of which $154,473.30 represented additional taxes for 1943 computed in accordance with the supposed settlement formula, and $35,528.86 the interest on such sum from December 15, 1943. The Collector deposited this check on September 29, 1947 in his "Suspense Account."

Notwithstanding this transaction, settlement conferences continued down to October 30, 1947, when they were broken off, the Head of the Technical Staff of the New York Division advising the Division Counsel on November 6, 1947 that a satisfactory settlement had not been reached and that defense of the case should proceed. However, negotiations were evidently resumed, for on February 24, 1948 a settlement stipulation was filed settling, among other things, the asserted 1943 excess profits tax deficiency for the sum of $140,147.87 which was $1,470.26 less than the amount attributable to excess profit taxes ($141,618.13) in the taxpayer's remittance of September 29, 1947.

On September 29, 1947, the taxpayer also forwarded to the Collector a check for $178,810.92, stated in the letter of transmittal to represent additional taxes of $49,953.38 for 1944, with interest in the amount of $8,492.07, and of $108,437.36 for 1945, with interest in the amount of $11,928.11. This remittance was predicated on a Revenue Agent's examination of the taxpayer's books for 1944 and 1945 (as well as 1946 and 1947), and a computation by the taxpayer's auditor applying in respect of excess profits taxes the same supposed settlement formula as underlay the taxpayer's remittance relating to 1943 excess profits taxes. Although no deficiency notice had been issued, and no settlement negotiations had been begun as to 1944 and 1945 taxes, the factors giving rise to the alleged excess profits tax deficiency for 1943 were deemed equally applicable to 1944 and 1945. The Collector also deposited this second remittance in his "Suspense Account."

The taxpayer charged on its books to earned surplus the principal amounts of these two remittances as tax payments, viz: $154,473.30 for 1943, $49,-953.38 for 1944, and $108,437.36 for 1945. Of the first item, $12,855.17 represented income taxes (with which we are not concerned here) and the balance, aggregating $30,008.87, represented excess profits taxes. The interest payments on these three items were charged to 1947 expense on the taxpayer's books, viz: $35,528.86 (1943), $8,492.07 (1944) and $11,928.11 (1945), or a total of $55,-949.04.

The taxpayer's position that the $300,008.87 of remittances in respect of excess profits taxes should have been allowed as a deduction in computing the net operating loss for 1947 (thereby increasing the "carry-back" to 1945) rests upon § 122(d)(6). As heretofore noted, this section gives a deduction for "the amount" of excess profits taxes "imposed" which were "paid or accrued within the taxable year."

Preliminarily it should be said that while there is an issue relating to the computation of the 1946 net operating loss (which we discuss later) as to the correctness of the Tax Court's holding that in the case of an accrual taxpayer, as this taxpayer was, this section permits only the deduction of excess profits taxes which accrued within the taxable year, for the point now under discussion the taxpayer accepts the decision of the Tax Court in this respect as being correct. It can afford to do so since it is clear that none of these excess profits taxes had accrued prior to 1947 because they were in dispute—see Dixie Pine Products Co. v. Comm'r, 320 U. S. 516 (1944)—and whether they accrued in 1947 depends upon whether they can be considered as "paid" in that year despite the fact that the dispute over them was not settled until at least 1948. See Chestnut Securities Co. v. United States, 62 F. Supp. 574 (Ct. Cls. 1945), and Lehigh Valley Railroad v. Comm'r, 12 T. C. 977 (1949). So the sole question with which we are now concerned is whether these 1947 remittances constituted taxes "paid" within the taxable year, that is 1947, within the meaning of § 122(d)(6). We think they did not.

A remittance made in respect of an asserted or putative tax liability in no proper sense constitutes a tax "payment" except to the extent that it is effective to discharge such liability in whole or in part. That in turn depends upon the agreement of the taxpayer and the Commissioner or his representatives, acting within their powers, or upon whether the taxing authorities have a duty under the particular circumstances involved to accept the remittance as a payment of the tax in full or pro tanto.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Here there was admittedly no agreement in this respect between the taxpayer and the taxing authorities in 1947, and the only question is whether the Collector was, in the setting of these remittances, under a duty to accept them as "payments" pro tanto of the asserted or putative tax liabilities against Lewyt. We think he had no such duty. The taxpayer's 1943 tax liability was still in dispute on September 29, 1947, when these remittances were made. Settlement negotiations continued into 1948, and no settlement was reached until February 1948. Meanwhile the taxpayer's proceedings in the Tax Court remained alive. With respect to 1944 and 1945 taxes, the Revenue Agent had commenced his examination of the taxpayer's 1944 and 1945 returns, and it was clear that the same issues giving rise to the Commissioner's deficiency notice of August 30, 1946 as regards 1943 taxes were also involved for 1944 and 1945. So far as the record discloses, deficiency notices for 1944 and 1945 were not issued until February 16, 1950; and, in any event, it is clear that the controversy as to those issues present in the 1943 dispute, which were also applicable to 1944 and 1945, was active until at least 1948.

In these circumstances, we think that the action of the Collector in placing these 1947 remittances in his "Suspense Account" to abide the event of the disposition of these disputes was quite proper. The taxpayer was not entitled to have these remittances treated as a satisfaction of its tax liabilities in whole or in part, and at the same time continue to contest such liabilities, or at best leave the Collector with an ambiguous situation on his hands.

Rosenman v. United States, 323 U. S. 658 (1945), while not reaching the precise point we have here, does support our view of the matter. In that case the Supreme Court held that the period of limitation on refund claims provided in § 910, I. R. C., requiring such claims to be presented within three years "after the payment of such tax," commenced to run from the time the Commissioner assessed the tax rather than from an earlier time when the taxpayer had made a general payment on account of estimated estate taxes. Stating that "payment" of a tax as contemplated by § 910, I. R. C., "plainly presupposes challenged action by the taxing officials" in response to which a remittance is made, the Court under the facts of that case held that no "tax payment" occurred until there had been an assessment followed by its satisfaction in part out of moneys already deposited with the Collector and in part by additional amounts paid by the taxpayer in response to such assessment, since it was only at that point that interest began to run against the Government on any amount in excess of that ultimately found due as the tax. While we do not read Rosenman to foreclose treating as a tax payment any remittance made prior to assessment, we do think that it supports the view that a remittance which does not satisfy an asserted tax liability should not be treated as the "payment" of a tax. Satisfaction may, as in Rosenman, follow from payment of a tax assessed, for such a payment extinguishes the asserted liability, even though the taxpayer is left with an independent claim for refund which survives the discharge of the assessment. Or it may follow from the payment of an asserted liability in advance of assessment, as appears to be contemplated by § 56(d), I. R. C., and 26 C. F. R. 601.13(b)(2),[2] if, as is expressly provided in the latter and by necessary implication in the former, the payment is accompanied by the taxpayer's acquiescence in the proposed deficiency. The same holds true as to § 271(a)(1)(B), requiring that amounts "collected without assessment" be excluded from the computation of a deficiency, for here again acquiescence by the taxpayer in such collections as constituting satisfaction of part of his tax liability is a condition necessarily to be implied. In short, there can be no payment without satisfaction whether pursuant to or apart from an assessment. Here the taxpayer was tendering its check with one hand, and contesting its liability to pay with the other. Its Tax Court proceedings as to the 1943 deficiency still stood, and that avenue was still open to it as to 1944 and 1945 taxes.

BLEED THROUGH

The taxpayer is quite mistaken, we believe, in reading Rosenman as standing for the proposition that the 1947 remittances should be treated as tax payments ab initio to the extent of the taxes ultimately found owing because they were effective to stop the running of interest against the taxpayer. The initial Rosenman payment was found not to be a tax payment despite the fact that the Court recognized that it stopped penalties and, as the Government conceded, interest against the taxpayer. It was found not to be a tax payment because it gave rise to no interest claim against the Government. The situation here is no different. Nor do we find such decisions as Hanley v. United States, 63 F. Supp. 73 (Ct. Cls. 1945), inconsistent with our conclusion, for there the taxpayer did not negative "payment" by simultaneous contest. Cf. Murphy v. United States, 78 F. Supp. 236 (S. D. Calif. 1948).

[2] See also informal ruling of Internal Revenue Bureau contained in Prentice-Hall Federal Tax Service, 1950, par. 76,331.

We hold that the 1947 remittances did not constitute "payment" of the taxpayer's 1943, 1944 and 1945 tax liabilities. They were no more than deposits "made in the nature of a cash bond for the payment of taxes thereafter found to be due." Rosenman, at p. 662.

The taxpayer also argues that the Tax Court's order entered on the 1948 stipulation settling the 1943 excess profits tax liability binds the Government by way of collateral estoppel from now asserting that the 1947 remittance in respect of the 1943 tax was not a payment of the tax. We need not dwell on this contention. It seems clear (although the pleadings are not before us) that the settlement was concerned only with the fact of payment and not with its date. The item in the stipulation "Tax paid: September 29, 1947 (3rd NY)" does not persuade us that the question we now have before us was really at issue in the Tax Court.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

2. 1947 Interest Payments

For the same reasons the taxpayer's contention as to the deductibility of the 1947 interest payments in respect of 1943, 1944 and 1945 taxes must also fail.

3. 1946 Net Operating Loss

The taxpayer challenges the determination of the Commissioner and the Tax Court as to the amount of the 1946 net operating loss.

As determined below, the net operating loss for 1946 was $164,326.38. The taxpayer argues that it should have been increased by $861,118.04, being the amount of the excess profits taxes which it paid in that year in respect of 1945.

This requires us to interpret the phrase "paid or accrued" in § 122(d)(6) permitting the deduction of excess profits taxes "paid or accrued within the taxable year" in the computation of the net operating loss under § 122(a). As already noted, it was unnecessary to reach this problem with respect to the 1947 net operating loss. The Tax Court held that "paid or accrued" meant that a cash taxpayer was entitled to deduct only excess profits taxes "paid," and an accrual taxpayer only those "accrued," within the taxable year, and that since Lewyt was an accrual taxpayer this sum of $861,118.04 could only be reckoned in Lewyt's tax computations for 1945. We think the Tax Court was right.

We start with the statute itself. Section 48(e), I. R. C., 26 U. S. C. A. §48, provides that "when used in this chapter" (that is Chapter 1 entitled "Income Tax") "the terms * * * 'paid or accrued' shall be construed according to the method of accounting upon the basis of which the net income is computed under this Part [IV "Accounting Periods and Methods of Accounting"].[3] See also T. R. 29.43-1. Section 43, I. R. C., 26 U. S. C. A. §43, captioned "Period for which deductions and credits taken," states: "The deductions and credits * * * provided for in this chapter [1] shall be taken for the taxable year in which 'paid or accrued' * * * dependent upon the method of accounting upon the basis of which net income is computed, unless in order to clearly reflect the income the deductions or credits should be taken as of a different period."

The taxpayer makes a number of arguments to avoid what we think to be the plain effect of these provisions. We consider first its argument based on legislative history. Section 202(a) of the Revenue Act of 1941 amended § 23(c) of the Internal Revenue Code to permit deduction of Chapter 2E excess profits taxes "paid or accrued within the taxable year" in computing net income, subject to certain rules provided in §23(c)(2), one of which, "A," stated: "The deduction shall be limited to the tax imposed for the taxable year, but any portion of such tax paid after the taxable year shall be considered as having been paid within the taxable year * * *" The taxpayer here points out, and we think correctly, that this last quoted provision in effect placed cash and accrual taxpayers substantially on an accrual basis so far as the excess profits tax deduction was concerned. Then came the Revenue Act of 1942 which by §105(c) eliminated Chapter 2E excess profits taxes as a deduction in computing net income, but added, by §105 (e)(3)(C), a new Section, §122(d)(6), permitting the deduction of such excess profits taxes from gross income in computing the net operating loss, and net operating loss "carry-backs" and "carry-overs," subject to rules which were the same as those presently contained in §122(d)(6).

Pointing out that these rules are substantially the same as those formerly contained in §23(c) (2) as amended by the Revenue Act of 1941, except that rule "A" of that section, quoted above, was omitted, the taxpayer argues that one of two inferences should be drawn—either that the Congressional intent was that the basis of deductibility of excess profits taxes should follow the taxpayer's method of accounting, i.e., cash or accrual, or that in this respect the Act gave a taxpayer, whether cash or accrual, an election to deduct such taxes if either paid or accrued. It is urged that the latter inference is the more compelling, it being argued, as we shall see in a moment, that to draw the first inference would attribute to Congress an intention to "discriminate" between cash and accrual taxpayers, in that an accrual taxpayer, absent such election, would rarely be able to take an excess profits deduction in a "loss" year.

We think that without more the arguments for and against these opposing inferences would at best present a stand-off. But we need not pause to examine them further, for here we have the explicit direction of §43 that this deduction "shall be taken for the taxable year in which 'paid or accrued' * * * dependent upon the method of accounting upon the basis of which net income is computed, unless in order to reflect the income the deductions * * * should be taken as of a different period." Certainly the exception would have no application in this instance, and it appears not to be contended to the contrary.

Next, we are referred to Commissioner v. Clarion Oil Co., 148 F. 2d 671 (D. C. Cir.), cert. denied 325 U. S. 881 (1945), and a line of cases following it, Birmingham v. Loetscher Co., 188 F. 2d 78 (8th Cir. 1951); Aramo-Stiftung v. Comm'r, 172 F. 2d 896 (2d Cir. 1949); and Wm. J. Lemp Brewing Co. v. Comm'r, 18 T. C. 586 (1952), holding that the provisions of former §356, I. R. C., now §505(a)(1), I. R. C., 26 U. S. C. A. §505, permitting the deduction of excess profits taxes "paid or accrued during the taxable year" in computing the surtax upon the undistributed net income of personal holding companies under §500, I. R. C., 26 U.S.C.A. §500, gives a taxpayer, whether cash or accrual, the option of taking this deduction on either basis. The ground of these decisions, as exemplified by Clarion, is that the provisions of §48(c) in Chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code defining "paid or accrued" in terms of a taxpayer's method of reporting for the purpose of computing net income under that Chapter, have no application to the meaning of §505(a)(1) permitting deduction of excess profits taxes for the purpose of computing the undistributed income tax on personal holding companies under Chapter 2. "But, obviously, this definition [48(c)] was intended to apply to the method of computing net income, and has no reference or relevancy to the subject matter of what, for the purposes of the newly added provision in relation to personal holding companies is taxable as undistributed income." Clarion, at p. 675. Stated otherwise, Chapter 2 contains no provisions comparable to §48(c) and §43 of Chapter 1 defining the phrase "paid or accrued."

BLEED THROUGH

The Clarion and the other cases cited are inapplicable to the one before us. Here the meaning of "paid or accrued" in § 122(d)(6) is directly involved in the computation of net income, for §23(s) allows as a deduction in "computing net income" under §23 "the net operating loss deduction computed under Section 122." In addition, to the extent that the meaning of "paid or accrued" is involved in the computation of the net operating loss itself by application of the §122(d)(6) deduction, §43 specifically gives it the same meaning as §48(c) requires in connection with the computation of net income.

The third contention which the taxpayer presses upon us is that to construe §122(d)(6) as we do discriminates against the accrual taxpayer. The argument is that in the nature of things it is usually impossible for a taxpayer to incur in the same year both an excess profits tax liability and a net operating loss. Therefore, it is said, an accrual taxpayer in most cases will be unable to get the benefit of the §122(d)(6) adjustment in calculating his net income, while a cash taxpayer normally will. Take this hypothetical situation as illustrative of the taxpayer's point. A corporation had high profit years in 1942 and 1943 and incurred a $1,000,000 excess profits tax liability in the latter year, which it paid in 1944. In 1944 it had a net operating loss of $500,000, without regard to any §122(d)(6) adjustment. If an accrual taxpayer, the corporation would not be able to add its excess profits taxes for 1943 to its net operating loss for 1944; if a cash taxpayer, it would; and this in turn would mean that the cash taxpayer's net operating loss "carry-back" to 1942 and 1943 under § 122(b)(1) would be increased by $1,000,000, whereas the accrual taxpayer's "carry-back" would remain at $500,000.

We may conceive of situations where the accrual taxpayer is not put at this disadvantage with the cash taxpayer. One such is a situation where, as in the case of this taxpayer's 1943 excess profits taxes, accrual of the excess profits tax liability has been postponed because of a dispute concerning it, and the time of payment and accrual therefore coincide. See Robert Reis & Co. v. Comm'r, 20 T. C. 294 (1953). Nevertheless, we would not be candid if we failed to recognize the force of what the taxpayer argues here. But however sympathetic one may be to this predicament of an accrual taxpayer—

BLEED THROUGH

a phenomenon by no means unique under the tax laws—we would not be justified in ignoring the plain mandate of the statute.

Finally, on this point the taxpayer gives us the decision of the Court of Claims in Olympic Radio and Television, Inc. v. United States, 108 F. Supp. 109 (1952), re-hearing denied 110 F. Supp. 600 (1953), which squarely upholds the position of the taxpayer as to the meaning of "paid or accrued" in §122(d)(6). We have given careful and respectful consideration to the two opinions of the majority in that case, which were based largely on the same considerations urged upon us by the taxpayer here, and find ourselves unable to agree with the Court of Claims.

4. 1946 Net Operating Loss "Carry-Back"

Now we come to the issue involving the "carry-back" of the 1946 net operating loss to 1944 and 1945. As previously noted, §122(b)(1) requires that such loss be applied first to the year 1944 and the excess, if any, to 1945. That excess is the amount by which the 1946 operating loss exceeds the income for 1944 "computed (A) with the exceptions, additions, and limitations provided in subsection (d)(1), (2), (4), and (6) [of §122] and (B) by determining the net operating loss deduction for such second preceding taxable year [1944] without regard to such [1946] net operating loss." §122(b)(1) and §122(c).

In terms of the present case, the situation is this: The taxpayer's 1944 income, as to which there is no dispute, was $584,866.81, without regard to any §122(d)(6) adjustment or the 1946 net operating loss deduction under §23(s). There was no net operating loss for 1944. The net operating loss for 1946, as determined by the Commissioner, was $164,326.38, and we have already disposed of the contention that it should have been increased by $861,118.04, the amount of the excess profits taxes paid by the taxpayer in 1946 in respect of 1945.

The taxpayer contends that in computing the amount of the 1946 net operating loss ($164,326.38) which is to be carried back to 1945, there should first be offset against 1944 net income ($584,866.81) either (a) the sum of $759,916.50, being the amount of the 1943 excess profits taxes reflected in the taxpayer's return for that year and paid by it in 1944, or (b) the sum of $625,561.59, being the amount of the 1944 excess profits taxes as reflected in the taxpayer's return for 1944, and which it claims accrued in 1944. Since under (a) the 1943 excess profits taxes paid in 1944 ($759,916.50) exceeded by $175,049.69 the unadjusted net income for 1944 ($584,866.81) and under (b) the 1944 excess profits taxes accrued for that year ($625,561.59) exceeded by $40,694.78 such net income for 1944 ($584,866.81), the taxpayer claims that the entire 1946 net operating loss ($164,326.38) constitutes a "carry-back" to 1945. We cannot agree.

What we have already held as to the meaning of "paid or accrued" in §122(d)(6) in connection with the computation of the 1946 net operating loss equally applies to the §122(d)(6) adjustment to 1944 net income, and disposes of the contention that for this purpose the taxpayer was entitled to deduct from such income the 1943 excess profits taxes paid in 1944.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The other contention must also fail. The excess profits taxes ultimately found by the Commissioner to be due in respect of the year 1944 were $280,540.33, and not $625,561.59, as originally reported in the taxpayer's 1944 return, and we think it was this figure rather than the uncorrected figure which represented the measure of the §122(d)(6) adjustment to 1944 net income. Section 122(d)(6) allows the deduction of "the amount" of excess profits taxes "imposed" and (in the case of an accrual taxpayer) "accrued within the taxable year." The tax which was "imposed" for 1944 was $280,540.33, and that in our opinion was "the amount" of the tax which "accrued" in 1944 for purposes of this adjustment. True, it has been held that when all the events necessary to determine the amount of a tax have occurred within a taxable year, the tax as reported in that year constitutes the tax "accrued" despite the occurrence of later events which change the amount of the tax ultimately found due. See United States v. Detroit-Moulding Corp., 56 F. Supp. 754 (E. D. Mich. 1944). But if we are to follow this view we should also take the income as originally reported in the 1944 return, viz., $827,852.99 instead of $584,866.81 as finally determined by the Commissioner. What the taxpayer is seeking to do is to have the benefit of both the smaller 1944 income as finally determined ($584,- 866.81) and the larger excess profits tax ($625,-561.59), based upon the income as originally reported. The taxpayer must match either the returned income ($827,852.99) against the returned excess profits tax based thereon ($625,561.59), or the determined income ($584,866.81) against the determined excess profits tax ($280,540.33). It cannot have it both ways at the same time by matching determined income against returned excess profits taxes. And we think it is determined income and excess profits taxes that represent the proper §122(d)(6) adjustment, since the manifest purpose of the "carry-back" and "carry-over" provisions of the statute, §122(b)(1), (2) is that the incidence of this kind of taxation upon a business enterprise shall in effect be looked at from the vantage point of a five year period, that is the current taxable year plus two "carry-back" and two "carry-over" taxable years.

In light of this wearisome discussion, we think that the correct situation as to the 1946 "carry-back" was this: The taxpayer's 1944 net income, before the §122(d)(6) and §23(s) adjustments, was $584,866.81. The excess profits taxes which accrued for 1944 were $280,540.33. After the §122(d)(6) adjustment ($584,866.81 minus $280,540.33), the balance of 1944 income was $304,326.48. Since this was greater than the net operating loss for 1946 ($164,326.38), this resulted, as the Commissioner and Tax Court determined, in there being nothing left from the 1946 net operating loss to "carry back" to 1945. It likewise resulted in there being taxable income for 1944.

5. Computation of 1945 Excess Profits Tax Deficiency

In computing the excess profits tax deficiency for 1945, the Commissioner apparently gave no credit for the $108,437.36 remitted by the taxpayer on September 29, 1947. The taxpayer asserts this was an amount "collected without assessment" which under §271(a)(1)(B) the Commissioner was required to take into account in computing the 1945 deficiency. See McConkey v. Comm'r, 199 F. 2d 892 (4th Cir. 1952), cert. denied 345 U. S. 924 (1953); Bendheim v. Comm'r, 2d Cir., decided June 9, 1954.

For the reasons already discussed, we think that this would be so only if the remittance were made under circumstances which would constitute it a satisfaction of a tax liability in whole or in part. In the McConkey and Bendheim cases, supra, the taxpayers made remittances similar to that now under consideration. Each of those remittances was deposited in the Collector's "Suspense Account" and stood, under the authority of the Rosenman case, as "a cash bond for the payment of taxes thereafter found to be due," or, in effect, as a continuing offer by the taxpayer to the Collector that he apply the amount to the discharge of a tax liability in whole or in part. And in each of those cases the Collector, after these deposits with their implicit offers had been made, stated a proposed deficiency not in excess of the deposit, thereby indicating unequivocally an acceptance of the taxpayer's offer. Accordingly, the amounts became "collected without assessment" within the meaning of §271(a)(1)(B), and the taxpayer's sole remedy remaining was an independent suit for refund.

Here, however, the Collector did not accept, explicitly or implicitly, the taxpayer's remittance as a discharge of its tax liability, in whole or in part, nor could he be forced to do so while that liability was still in dispute. Indeed, no deficiency had yet been proposed in 1947. But in 1948 the Revenue Agent proposed a deficiency in excess of the taxpayer's remittance, as to which the Commissioner issued his deficiency notice on February 16, 1950, and which the taxpayer was free to, and did, contest; and certainly the Commissioner for his part was not required to circumscribe his position in the ensuing litigation in the Tax Court by making application of such remittance to the asserted tax liability. In other words, until the Commissioner, with unequivocal authority of the taxpayer, applied or was required to apply the $108,437.36 remittance as a satisfaction, in whole or in part, of the asserted tax liability, this remittance did not constitute an amount "collected without assessment" within the meaning of §271, but continued as no more than a deposit voluntarily made by the taxpayer.

Affirmed.

OCTOBER TERM, 1954

No. 10

THE UNITED STATES, PETITIONER

v.

OLYMPIC RADIO AND TELEVISION, INC.

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF CLAIMS

BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES

OPINIONS BELOW

The original opinion of the Court of Claims and the dissenting opinion (R. 10-14) are reported in 108 F. Supp. 109. The opinion on rehearing (R. 16-19) is reported in 110 F. Supp. 600.

JURISDICTION

The judgment of the Court of Claims was entered November 4, 1952. (R. 10, 14.) On December 3, 1952, the Government filed a motion for rehearing (R. 14) which was denied on March 3, 1953 (R. 16).

The petition for a writ of certiorari was filed on May 29, 1953, and was granted on October 14, 1954. (R. 21.) The jurisdiction of this Court rests on 28 U.S.C., Section 1255(1).

QUESTION PRESENTED

Whether, under Section 122(d)(6) of the Internal Revenue Code, a taxpayer on the accrual basis can, in computing its net operating loss for one year, deduct the amount of excess profits taxes which were paid in that year but had accrued in an earlier year.

STATUTE AND REGULATIONS INVOLVED

The pertinent statutory provisions (Sections 23(c)(1) and (s), 41, 43, 48(c), 122, 710(a)(1) and (b), 711(a)(1)(J) and (2)(L) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1939) [1] and Treasury Regulations (Treasury Regulations 111, Sections 29.41-1, 29.41-2, 29.43-1, 29.122-1, and 29.122-2) are set forth in Appendix A, infra, pp. 36-53.

STATEMENT

This case was submitted to the Court of Claims on motions for summary judgments filed by both parties, together with supporting affidavits. The facts, which are not in dispute, are as follows:

Taxpayer, a New York corporation, keeps its accounts and files its income and excess profits tax returns on the accrual basis, using the calendar year as its accounting period. (R. 1.) It seeks to recover in this action the sum of $148,841.72, representing a portion of the excess profits tax for the year 1944 which it paid in 1945 in the total amount of $623,454.42. (R. 2, 3, 11.)

Taxpayer's income tax return for the year 1946 reflected a net operating loss of $324,844.23 which, upon audit by the Commissioner and with taxpayer's acquiescence, was reduced to $310,872.60. (R. 2.) The net operating loss of $310,872.60 was carried back and set off against taxpayer's excess profits net income for 1944, as permitted by law, and its excess profits tax for 1944 was adjusted in conformity with the resulting reduction in income. (R. 2, 5, 11.) This adjustment is not in controversy.

In the year 1946 taxpayer paid $263,272.80 on account of a reported excess profits tax liability of $346,643.22 for the year 1945. (R. 2, 9.) It contends that under Section 122(d)(6) of the Internal Revenue Code (Appendix A, infra, p. 42) the $263,272.80 so paid in 1946 should have been added to the admitted net operating loss of $310,872.60 for that year, and that the sum of these two figures ($574,145.40), instead of the second figure alone, should have been carried back as a net operating loss from 1946 to 1944 (R. 5, 11). If this had been done, the Court of Claims found, it would have further reduced the 1944 excess profits tax liability by $148,841.72, which is the amount claimed in this suit. (R. 11-12.)

Although, as stated above, taxpayer originally reported an excess profits tax liability of $346,643.22 for the year 1945, of which $263,272.80 was paid in 1946, the entire amount of the reported tax was subsequently refunded or credited to taxpayer as a result of a net operating loss carryback from 1947 to 1945. (R. 10.)

The Court of Claims sustained taxpayer's contention and held (Madden, J., with whom Jones, C. J., concurred, dissenting) that, in computing its net operating loss for 1946, taxpayer was entitled to include therein the amount of excess profits tax paid in 1946 on account of the liability shown on its return for the year 1945. (R. 10-14.) Judgment was entered in favor of taxpayer in the amount of $148,841.72 with interest. (R. 14.) On rehearing, the court adhered to its original decision. (R. 16-19.)

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

I

A. The applicable statutory definitions require the conclusion that Congress used the alternative verbs "paid or accrued" in Section 122(d)(6) to distinguish between taxpayers on a cash basis and taxpayers on an accrual basis (i. e., "paid," if on cash basis, and "accrued," if on accrual basis), and that a taxpayer has no option to take deductions on a basis inconsistent with the method of accounting which it employs. Thus, Section 48(c) explicitly directs that, when used in "this chapter" (Chapter 1, which includes Section 122), the "terms 'paid or incurred' and 'paid or accrued' shall be construed according to the method of accounting upon the basis of which the net income is computed. . ." The same principle is declared in the relevant accounting rules prescribed by the Code (Sections 41, 43) and in pertinent Treasury Regulations. As stated by the Second Circuit in Lewyt Corp. v. Commissioner, No. 417, there can be no "ignoring the plain mandate of the statute" (215 F. 2d 518, 526). There is particularly strong reason when a taxpayer is seeking the advantage of a deduction—a matter not of right but of legislative grace—that it be required to bring itself clearly within the statute.

In keeping with the above provisions, the courts have held, in a wide variety of situations, that one reporting income on an accrual basis is bound by the rule which requires such a taxpayer to take deductions only in the year of accrual. It is also significant that taxpayer does not suggest a recomputation of the whole of its operations on a cash basis consistent with its claim for taking subsection (d)(6) deductions on a cash basis.

Taxpayer is not aided by Commissioner v. Clarion Oil Co., 148 F. 2d 671 (C.A. D.C.), and similar cases involving the imposition of a penalty surtax on the undistributed income of personal holding companies. Those cases hold that while the statutory definitions of "paid or accrued" in terms control the method of computing net income (see 148 F. 2d at 675), they need not be applied in determining the penalty tax on undistributed income prescribed by subchapter A of chapter 2. The net operating loss deduction claimed in the instant case relates solely to the "computing [of] net income" (Section 23(s)) and, under the reasoning of Clarion Oil, the statutory definition of "paid or accrued" controls.

Taxpayer also urges a departure from the statutory definition on the ground that otherwise accrual basis taxpayers will get no substantial benefits from Section 122(d)(6). But there are situations in which excess profits taxes will "accrue" during a loss year and will cause or augment a net operating loss. See, e.g., Robert Reis & Co. v. Commissioner, 20 T.C. 294. And, in any event, the fact that cash basis taxpayers may as a practical matter derive more benefits from this provision than accrual basis taxpayers could not warrant a revision of the statute by the courts. Cf. Crooks v. Harrelson, 282 U.S. 55, 60.

B. Taxpayer asserts the right to augment its 1946 net operating loss by the amount of excess profits taxes, accrued in 1945, which it paid in 1946. Assuming, arguendo, contrary to our contention above, that the statute permits an accrual basis taxpayer to follow such a course, there is a further obstacle to the claimed deduction in the instant case. The amount paid in 1946 was subsequently refunded in full as a result of a carryback from 1947. Thus, no actual economic loss was suffered as a result of the 1946 payments and no net operating loss can be founded upon them. Section 122(d)(6) allows as a deduction the amount of excess profits taxes actually imposed in a given taxable year. There were not two excess profits taxes imposed for 1945; there was only one, and that was in the amount as finally determined.

II

The language of Section 122(d)(6) had its antecedent in Section 23(c)(2) as amended by the Revenue Act of 1941. Examination of the earlier section in its entirety shows that when Congress wished to treat cash basis and accrual basis taxpayers similarly for purposes of a particular deduction, it did so explicitly. Rule "A" of Section 23(c)(2) provided:

> The deduction shall be limited to the tax imposed for the taxable year, but any portion of such tax paid after the taxable year shall be considered as having been paid within the taxable year; * * *

The failure to adopt a similar provision in Section 122(d)(6), added in 1942, supports the view that the words "paid or accrued", as there used, must be taken in their ordinary, statutory sense.

The specific Congressional purpose in adding Section 122(d)(6) is not unequivocally expressed in the legislative history. The underlying legislative policy can be gleaned, however, from the following:

(1) The language of the new subsection had its origin in Section 23(c)(2) as amended by the 1941 Act. In the framework of that Act, a taxpayer deducted its excess profits tax for purposes of computing its other corporate taxes (normal tax and surtax). When this was altered by the 1942 Act, which authorized a different and larger deduction, and hence a new method of computing the normal tax and surtax, Section 23(c)(2), providing for deduction of excess profits tax, was repealed.

(2) The reappearance of this language in Section 122(d)(6), described as one of a "number of miscellaneous amendments" of a "technical" nature "made necessary by [the] change in base for corporate tax" and required "in order to make it all come out straight," hardly suggests that Congress contemplated a novel and far-reaching deduction of the kind which taxpayer urges—a deduction which would permit a corporation, whether on cash or accrual basis, to deduct all excess profits taxes, both paid and accrued within any taxable year, for purposes of determining its net operating loss.

Since it may be fairly stated that, whatever else was contemplated (or overlooked), there is no evidence of an express or implied intention to effect a drastic departure from familiar and accepted tax concepts, the legislative history, far from supporting the motion that (d)(6) should be construed to obliterate the statutory definition of "paid or accrued," emphasizes the wisdom of confining the amendment within the limits of its statutorily-defined terminology.

ARGUMENT

Section 23(s) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1939 provides that in computing net income there shall be allowed "the net operating loss deduction computed under section 122" (Appendix A, infra, p. 36). The "net operating loss deduction" for a taxable year is based on the "net operating losses" for the two preceding and two succeeding years, which, subject to certain adjustments, become available as "carry-overs" and "carry-backs" to the taxable year.[2] We are here concerned with the amount of the "net operating loss" for the year 1946 which may be carried back to the year 1944. Section 122(a) of the Code defines the term "net operating loss" to mean "the excess of the deductions allowed by this chapter [Income Tax] over the gross income, with the exceptions, additions, and limitations provided in subsection (d)." (Appendix A, infra, p. 38.) Section 122(d)(6) provides that "There shall be allowed as a deduction the amount of tax imposed by Subchapter E of Chapter 2 [Excess Profits Tax] paid or accrued within the taxable year." (Appendix A, infra, p. 42.)[3]

The years 1944 and 1945 were years of profit for taxpayer, and were followed by years of loss

[2] Determination of the net operating loss under Section 122 (a) is the first of the three steps involved in computation of the net operating loss deduction. The second involves determination of the amount and extent to which the net operating loss may be utilized as a two-year carry-back or carry-over, as set out in Section 122(b) (Appendix A, infra, pp. 38-40). The third step is conversion of the aggregate of permissible carry-overs and carry-backs under Section 122(c) (Appendix A, infra, pp. 40-41) into the net operating loss deduction. Reo Motors v. Commissioner, 338 U.S. 442, 446-447; Treasury Regulations 111, Section 29.122-1 (Appendix A, infra, pp. 49-50).

in 1946 and 1947. (Statement, supra, pp. 3-4.) The court below (two judges dissenting) held that although taxpayer admittedly maintained its books and records and filed its tax returns on the accrual basis of accounting, and although its 1945 excess profits tax accordingly accrued in 1945, taxpayer might nonetheless, under Section 122(d)(6), augment its net operating loss for 1946 by including the sum of $263,272.80 paid in 1946 on account of its excess profits tax liability for 1945. (R. 11-14.) In reaching this result, which is diametrically opposed to the holding of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in the companion case of Lewyt Corp. v. Commissioner, No. 417, this Term (see 215 F. 2d 518, 523-526, affirming the unanimous decision of the full Tax Court, 18 T.C. 1245), the majority of the court of claims conceded that its decision "does violence to the letter of the Act" but was of the view that the result was in keeping with the purpose of Congress. (R. 13.)[4]

[4] The majority below noted its disagreement and the minority its concurrence with the Tax Court's decision in the Lewyt case. (R. 14.) Since the decision below, the Tax Court has repeatedly expressed adherence to its decision in Lewyt. Hunter Manufacturing Corp. v. Commissioner, 21 T.C. 424, appeal pending (C.A. 3d); Wheeler Insulated Wire Co. v. Commissioner, 22 T.C. 380, appeal pending (C.A. 2d); *W. It is the Government's position that in the light of the unambiguous provisions of the Internal Revenue Code, which are discussed in Point I, infra, it was not open to the court below to speculate concerning the possible purposes contemplated by Congress and to create opportunities for extensive deductions in circumstances where they are explicitly precluded by the statutory language. We shall urge additionally (Point II, infra) that the legislative history does not support the Court of Claims' position, but fairly indicates that Congress did not intend to change the meaning of "paid or accrued" explicitly defined in Chapter 1 of the Code.

I

The Explicit Mandate of the Statute Precludes Allowance of the Deduction for Which Taxpayer Contends

A. Section 122(d)(6) denies an accrual basis taxpayer the right to deduct its excess profits tax in the year paid, if the tax accrued in another year.

1. As stated above, Section 122(d)(6) permits deduction of the amount of excess profits tax "paid or accrued" in the taxable year. In our view, definitive provisions of the Internal Revenue Code, as well as implementing Treasury Regulations of long standing, require the conclusion that the alternative verbs "paid or accrued" serve to distinguish between taxpayers on a cash basis and taxpayers on an accrual basis (i.e., "paid," if on a cash basis, and "accrued," if on an accrual basis) and do not provide the taxpayer an option to take deductions on a basis inconsistent with the method of accounting which it employs.

Section 41 (Appendix A, infra, p. 37) states the general rule that "net income shall be computed upon the basis of the taxpayer's annual accounting period * * * in accordance with the method of accounting regularly employed in keeping the books of such taxpayer * * *."

Section 43, entitled "Period for Which Deductions and Credits Taken," provides (Appendix A, infra, pp. 37-38):

> The deductions and credits * * * provided for in this chapter shall be taken for the taxable year in which "paid or accrued" or "paid or incurred," dependent upon the method of accounting upon the basis of which the net income is computed, unless in order to clearly reflect the income the deductions or credits should be taken as of a different period.

Even more pointedly, Section 48(c) specifically provides (Appendix A, infra, p. 38) that, when used in "this chapter" (i.e., Chapter 1, entitled "Income Tax," which includes Section 122)—

> The terms "paid or incurred" and "paid or accrued" shall be construed according to the method of accounting upon the basis of which the net income is computed * * *.[5]

[5] This language has been substantially incorporated in income tax legislation commencing with the Revenue Act of 1918, c. 18, 40 Stat. 1057, Section 200.

Treasury Regulations 111, Section 29.41-2 (Appendix A, infra, pp. 47-48), referring to the definition in Section 48, declares that "A method of accounting will not * * * be regarded as clearly reflecting income unless all items of gross income and all deductions are treated with reasonable consistency." And Section 29.43-1(a) of the Regulations (Appendix A, infra, pp. 48-49) states:

> The terms "paid or incurred" and "paid or accrued" will be construed according to the method of accounting upon the basis of which the net income is computed by the taxpayer. (See section 48(c).)

The above provisions are unequivocal. As stated by the court of appeals in the companion Lewyt case, No. 417, no argument rested on claim of hardship or legislative history which might be advanced in favor of a different result could justify "ignoring the plain mandate of the statute" (215 F. 2d at 526). To similar effect, see Healy v. Commissioner, 345 U.S. 278, 284-285; Riley Co. v. Commissioner, 311 U.S. 55, 59; Crooks v. Harrelson, 282 U.S. 55, 60; United States v. Hill, 248 U.S. 420. There is particularly strong reason when a taxpayer is seeking the advantage of a deduction—a matter not of right but of legislative grace—that it be required to bring itself clearly within the statutory provision. Standard Paving Co. v. Commissioner, 190 F. 2d 330, 333-334 (C.A. 10th); see also New Colonial Co. v. Helvering, 292 U.S. 435, 440; White v. United States, 305 U.S. 281, 292; Deputy v. duPont, 308 U.S. 488, 493.

2. In keeping with the statutory provisions discussed above, the courts have held, in a wide variety of situations, that one reporting income on an accrual basis may not evade the rule which requires such a taxpayer to take deductions in the year of accrual. See, e.g., this Court's decisions in Security Mills Co. v. Commissioner, 321 U.S. 281; Aluminum Castings Co. v. Routzahn, 282 U.S. 92; Niles Bement Pond Co. v. United States, 281 U.S. 357; United States v. Anderson, 269 U.S. 422.[5a]

This Court's decision in Reo Motors v. Commissioner, 338 U.S. 442, is also closely in point, for there, as here, the taxpayer contended that language in Section 122 should bear a special interpretation different from the meaning accorded the same terms when used in other parts of Chapter 1. Rejecting this contention, the Court declared (p. 448):

> If, as petitioner contends, 1942 law governs although the loss occurred in 1941, it is difficult to see why the whole of its 1941 operations, and not merely the Reo Sales liquidation, should not be recomputed on the basis of the income and deduction provisions applicable in 1942. Petitioner does not suggest such a re-

[5a] It is to be noted that Section 23, which provides (subsection (s)) that in computing net income there shall be allowed "the net operating loss deduction computed under section 122," uses the words "paid or incurred" and "paid or accrued" in various subsections (subsections (a)(1) and (2) (expenses); (b) (interest); (p) (pension trust); (z)(1) (taxes and interest paid to cooperative apartments)). And see especially Section 23 (c) (1), relating to deduction of taxes (Appendix A, infra, p. 36). There appear to be no cases arising under these subsections in which the courts have treated the quoted words in any sense other than that specified by > computation, in spite of the fact that the terms in which net operating loss is defined—"gross income" and "deductions allowed by this chapter"—are equally applicable in the computation of income taxes generally. [Emphasis added.]

Nor does the taxpayer in the instant case suggest a recomputation of the tax for the whole of its operations for the pertinent years on a cash basis consistent with its claim for taking subsection (d)(6) deductions on a cash basis. Indeed, with the exception of the term "paid or accrued," taxpayer does not suggest that any of the numerous terms contained in Section 122 [6] should be interpreted differently for purposes of that section from the way in which they are understood throughout Chapter 1. [7] Yet, as observed above, it is explicitly directed in

Section 48(c). See Mertens' comment (5 Mertens, Law of Federal Income Taxation (1953 ed.), Section 27.52), in relation to Section 23 (c)(1), that taxes are deductible "in the year of payment, and only in that year, by taxpayers on a cash basis and in the year of accrual, and only in that year, by taxpayers on an accrual basis."

[6] Examples of such terms, with which Section 122 is replete, are: "deductions allowed by this chapter," "gross income," "taxable year," "net income," "normal-tax net income," "discovery value," and in 122(d), in particular, "depletion," "percentage depletion," "interest paid or accrued," "capital assets," "operation of a trade or business," "consolidated return."

[7] It may be noted that the House Committee which originally recommended the enactment of Section 122 in the 1939 Act assumed that the definitions contained in Section 48 would be applicable to Section 122. Thus, referring to the term "taxable year" used in Section 122(b), the Committee stated (H. Rep. 855, 76th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 17 (1939-2 Cum. Bull., p. 517)):

> For the purpose of ascertaining the first, second, or third preceding taxable year, a fractional part of a year which

Section 48(c) that the term " 'paid or accrued' shall be construed" according to taxpayer's method of accounting.

The line of cases upon which the majority below relied (R. 13) is clearly distinguishable.[8] Those cases involved provisions of the Code imposing a penalty surtax on the undistributed profits of personal holding companies. In computing the amount of undistributed profits, Section 505(a) permitted, inter alia, the deduction of excess profits taxes "paid or accrued during the taxable year." The cases in question hold that for purposes of these penalty provisions, which are incorporated in the personal holding company surtax provisions of Sections 500 et seq., Chapter 2, the definitions of "paid or accrued" contained in Chapter 1 (see Sections 43 and 48(c), discussed supra, pp. 12-13) need not be deemed controlling. Thus, speaking of Section 48(c), the court stated in the Clarion Oil case (148 F. 2d, p. 675):

> But, obviously, this definition was intended to apply to the method of computing net income, and has no reference or relevancy to the subject matter of what, for the purposes of the > newly added provision in relation to personal holding companies, is taxable as undistributed income.

is a taxable year under section 48(a), is a preceding taxable year.

The governing regulation (Treasury Regulations 111, Section 29.122-1) makes the same reference.

However, under Section 23(s), here involved, "the net operating loss deduction computed under section 122" is deductible "in computing net income." (Emphasis added.) Under the very reasoning of Clarion Oil, therefore, Chapter 1 definitions of "paid or accrued" control. To restate the point in the language of the court of appeals in the Lewyt case (215 F. 2d, p. 525):

> The Clarion and the other cases cited are inapplicable to the one before us. Here the meaning of "paid or accrued" in § 122(d)(6) is directly involved in the computation of net income, for § 23(s) allows as a deduction in "computing net income" under § 23 "the net operating loss deduction computed under section 122." In addition, to the extent that the meaning of "paid or accrued" is involved in the computation of the net operating loss itself by application of the § 122(d)(6) deduction, § 43 specifically gives it the same meaning as § 48(c) requires in connection with the computation of net income.

See, also, dissenting opinion of Judge Madden below. (R. 14.)

work an inequitable result. The contention is that while such a construction extends substantial benefits to a cash basis taxpayer, "it is almost impossible as a practical matter for an accrual basis taxpayer to incur a net operating loss under Chapter 1 * * * and in the same year incur an excess profits tax liability under Chapter 2E * * *." (Br. in Op. 11.)

We would point out, to begin with, that there are situations in which the statutory provision, as we construe it, will result in benefit to an accrual basis taxpayer. For example, an accrual basis taxpayer may derive benefit from Section 122(d)(6) if excess profits taxes for a given year are disputed and not settled until a later year.[9] Under the rule established by Dixie Pine Co. v. Commissioner, 320 U.S. 516, the disputed tax liability accrues in the year of settlement, which might, of course, be a loss year. It then becomes part of the net operating loss for that year. That was the precise situation before the Tax Court in Robert Reis & Co. v. Commissioner, 20 T.C. 294, 298-299, in which the court commented:

> In passing, we note that our holding refutes a contention made by the taxpayer in the Lewyt case. There it was argued that to construe "paid or accrued" as used in section 122(d)(6) as referring to the accounting system used by the taxpayer would deny ac-

[9] Originally, taxpayer claimed not only the 1945 tax paid in 1946 but also certain other taxes which accrued in 1946 as the result of a settlement in that year of disputed taxes for an earlier year. However, it subsequently abandoned its claim as to the accrued taxes (R. 5, 7.)

> crual basis taxpayers any benefit under the section. We point out that the accrual taxpayer here does get a benefit.

See, also, the court of appeals opinion in Lewyt, 215 F. 2d at 526.

Another instance is that of an accrual basis taxpayer which, having derived abnormal income during a given taxable period, allocated part of that income, for excess profits tax purposes, to a later tax year, as authorized by Code Section 721. The later year could, of course, be a loss year.[10]

More broadly, we would emphasize that innumerable individual provisions in the complex structure of the tax laws will have a differing incidence depending on the method of accounting utilized by the taxpayer. Thus, in 1940, when the excess profits tax took effect, the cash basis taxpayer was obliged to pay the tax on goods or services sold and delivered in 1939 for which payment was received in 1940. In the case of the accrual basis taxpayer, identical transactions were free from excess profits taxation. This example might be multiplied many times over. Such results will inevitably occur unless Congress should require all taxpayers to employ the same system of accounting for tax purposes. The underlying assumption upon which the tax laws operate is that when a taxpayer adopts a method of accounting (a taxpayer whose transactions are many and complicated usually finds the accrual method more desirable because expenses are more likely to be deducted in the year in which the income to which they relate is reported), the disadvantages which attach to that method will not, over the long run, outweigh the advantages. In substance, Congress has said to the taxpayer: You may exercise the option to keep your books on a cash basis or an accrual basis; but you may not compute your income and your deductions on one basis for purposes of one provision of the income tax laws and on another basis for purposes of another provision of those laws.

In rejecting arguments similar to those made by respondent, based upon alleged hardships to individual taxpayers or classes of taxpayers, this Court stated (Crooks v. Harrelson, 282 U.S. 55, 60):

> It is not enough merely that hard and objectionable or absurd consequences, which probably were not within the contemplation of the framers, are produced by an act of legislation. Laws enacted with good intention, when put to the test, frequently, and to the surprise of the law maker himself, turn out to be mischievous, absurd or otherwise objectionable. But in such case the remedy lies with the law making authority, and not with the courts.

B. In any event, a deduction under Section 122(d)(6) must reflect an excess profits tax actually imposed. Taxpayer's claim here lacks this foundation

We have argued above that taxpayer could not add its 1945 excess profits tax, paid in 1946, to its 1946 net operating loss because, as an accrual basis taxpayer, its tax accrued in 1945. Assuming, arguendo, however, that taxpayer could hurdle this obstacle, there is a further barrier to allowance of taxpayer's claim.

As pointed out in the Statement (supra, p. 4), the 1945 excess profits tax paid by taxpayer was subsequently refunded or credited in full as a result of a net operating loss carry-back from 1947. Thus, the 1945 excess profits tax liability was wiped out. And since no economic loss was suffered, the foundation upon which taxpayer seeks to augment its 1946 net operating loss is destroyed.

We would emphasize that Section 122(d)(6) allows as a deduction "the amount of [excess profits] tax imposed . . ." (emphasis added). A sum which was paid in the loss year, but was subsequently refunded, does not represent an amount of tax actually imposed. Certainly, there were not two amounts imposed for 1945; there was only one, and that one was the amount which finally became determinable after application of the 1947 carry-back.

Essentially the same question (though arising in a somewhat different context) is before this Court in Lewyt, No. 417. As Judge Harlan stated for the court of appeals in that case, "The excess profits taxes ultimately found by the Commissioner to be due in respect of the year 1944 . . . rather than the uncorrected figure . . ." constituted " 'the amount' of excess profits taxes 'imposed' " within the meaning of Section 122(d)(6). Application of this principle to the case at bar would require reversal of the Court of Claims' judgment here, entirely apart from the issue discussed in Point IA, supra.[10a]

The Legislative History Furnishes No Basis for a Departure from the Statutory Language

The discussion of the legislative history which follows is addressed to two questions: (a) Whether there is anything in the legislative antecedents and history of Section 122(d)(6) to show that the phrase "paid or accrued" used in that section was meant to have a meaning varying from the statutory definition of the term; and (b) whether the entire statutory scheme and history show that Congress proposed to extend to accrual basis taxpayers, through the deduction of excess profits taxes, benefits in addition to those which could be accorded them under the prevailing definitions of the statute.

A. The court below did not discuss taxpayer's argument, renewed in the brief in opposition to certiorari (pp. 7-9), based upon the legislative antecedents and history of Section 122(d)(6)—a failure which suggests that it found no support there for its conclusion. In the Lewyt case, the taxpayer advanced a similar argument, both in the Tax Court and in the court of appeals. Those courts found that the history of Section 122(d)(6) and its antecedents was inconclusive and provided no warrant for rejecting the statutory definition of "paid or accrued." See 18 T.C. at 1251-1252; 215 F. 2d at 524-525.

The committee reports, themselves, are silent in respect to the meaning of "paid or accrued" as used in Section 122(d)(6), and taxpayer's argument rests upon inferences which it seeks to draw from the omission of language used in a different context in an earlier year. That argument (summarized by the Second Circuit in Lewyt, 215 F. 2d at 524), is as follows:

Section 202(a) of the Revenue Act of 1941 amended Section 23(c) of the Internal Revenue Code to permit deduction of Chapter 2E excess profits taxes "paid or accrued within the taxable year" in computing net income, subject to certain rules provided in Section 23(c)(2).[11] The following year, the Revenue Act of 1942, c. 619, 56 Stat. 798, eliminated Chapter 2E excess profits taxes as a deduction in computing net income, but added a new section (Section 122(d)(6)) permitting the deduction of such excess profits taxes from gross income in computing the net operating loss, and net operating loss "carry-backs" and "carry-overs."[12] This was subject to rules substantially the same as those formerly contained in Section 23(c)(2), as amended by the Revenue Act of 1941, except that rule "A" of that section, quoted above (note 11), was omitted.

[11] (2) Excess-Profits Tax Under Chapter 2E—Special Rules. —For the purposes of this subsection, in the case of the excess-profits tax imposed by Subchapter E of Chapter 2—

(A) The deduction shall be limited to the tax imposed for the taxable year, but any portion of such tax paid after the taxable year shall be considered as having been paid within the taxable year;

Pointing out that the effect of rule "A" in Section 23(c)(2) was to place a cash basis taxpayer substantially on the accrual basis so far as the excess profits tax deduction was concerned, taxpayer argues that the omission of that rule in Section 122(d)(6) suggests that Congress did not intend to place all taxpayers on the accrual basis. Accepting this inference, however, it certainly does not follow that Congress meant to give either class of taxpayers (accrual basis or cash basis) an election to deduct its excess profits taxes on a basis inconsistent with the method of accounting to which that class was committed.

of the credit for income, war-profits, or excess-profits taxes paid to any foreign country or possession of the United States;

(D) Such tax, in the case of a consolidated return under section 730, shall be allocated to the members of the affiliated group under regulations prescribed by the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary.

[12] The elimination and the addition were accomplished by Sections 105(c) and 105(e)(3)(C) of the 1942 Act, respectively.

Indeed, this phase of the legislative history tends to support the Government's position that Congress used "paid or accrued," in Section 122(d)(6), in its customary, statutorily-defined sense. Rule "A" of Section 23(c)(2), as added by the 1941 Act, appeared in a section allowing the deduction of taxes "paid or accrued." It cannot be denied that the phrase "paid or accrued" was there used as a term of art, i.e., in its long-accepted, statutory sense. The professed purpose of Congress in the enactment of Rule "A" was to place all taxpayers, cash and accrual, on the same basis in respect to the deduction for excess profits taxes.[13] Congress did so, however, not by giving a right of election or by stating that a cash basis taxpayer might deduct "accrued" taxes; it expressly provided that any portion of such tax "paid" after the taxable year "shall be considered as having been paid within the taxable year."[14] The manner

[13] H. Rep. No. 1040, 77th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 46 (1941-2 Cum. Bull. 413, 450); S. Rep. No. 673 (Part 1), 77th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 37 (1941-2 Cum. Bull. 466, 495-496):

> It is provided that the deduction shall be allowed only in computing the income tax imposed for the taxable year for which the excess-profits tax is levied. By providing that any excess-profits tax paid after the taxable year shall be deemed to have been paid within the taxable year, the same treatment is accorded to taxpayers on the cash basis as is accorded to taxpayers on the accrual basis.

[14] Contrast Code Section 131(d), dealing with the credit for foreign taxes, which provides, subject to certain conditions, that the credits may, "at the option of the taxpayer and irrespective of the method of accounting employed in keeping his books," be taken in the year in which the taxes of the foreign country "accrued."

of effecting, for this purpose, similarity of treatment of cash and accrual basis taxpayers reflects a recognition of the settled meaning of "paid or accrued." The inferences to be drawn from the enactment of Rule "A" of Section 23(c)(2), therefore, are: (1) That Congress was aware of its own statutory definition of "paid or accrued," and (2) that when Congress desired to have cash and accrual basis taxpayers treated alike for certain purposes it knew how to accomplish its purpose. Accordingly, the omission of Rule "A" in the enactment of Section 122(d)(6) in 1942 may reasonably be taken as a continued recognition by Congress of the statutory meaning of "paid or accrued" and as evidence of a Congressional purpose limited to withdrawal of the presumption contained in Rule "A", i.e., the presumption that all excess profits taxes paid by a cash basis taxpayer were paid within the taxable year to which they pertained though in fact paid after the taxable year.

B. As pointed out above, under the 1941 Act the amount of the excess profits tax constituted a deduction for purposes of computation of the normal tax and surtax. This deduction was expressly eliminated under the Revenue Act of 1942 when a larger deduction was allowed in its place. The taxpayer, in computing the normal tax and surtax, is authorized by the 1942 Act to use as a credit the base upon which the excess profits tax is computed, i.e., the amount of the adjusted excess profits net income.[15] Having thus allowed the base upon which the excess profits tax is computed as a credit, the further allowance of the tax itself as a deduction or credit grants pro tanto the same benefit twice over. There is no suggestion that such a double benefit is available to taxpayers with stable profits year in and year out. Yet the underlying purpose in the enactment of the net operating loss deduction was to avoid tax discrimination against businesses with alternating or fluctuating profit and loss years in favor of those with stable profits year in and year out.[16] Certainly, it was not to create a tax advantage in favor of the former; nor is it to be supposed that Congress, without saying that it was doing so, intentionally granted to taxpayers with fluctuating profits double benefits denied to taxpayers generally.

This conclusion is fortified by the fact that the 1942 Act was a war revenue measure notable for its increases in corporate income and excess profits taxes.[17] In the context of such a bill, it is particularly difficult to give credence to the notion that Congress proposed, in an incidental fashion and by an amendment which, as we show below, it characterized as "technical," to legislate a novel deduction authorizing the cancellation or refund of huge amounts of taxes.

The change effected by the 1942 Act in respect to the base for computation of corporate taxes was described in the pertinent Ways and Means Committee Report as follows (H. Rep. No. 2333, 77th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 18 (1942-2 Cum. Bull. 372, 388):

> 1. Change in the Base for Corporate Tax
>
> Under the present law, the excess-profits tax is computed before the normal tax and surtax, being allowed as a deduction in determining the bases to which those taxes apply. Thus, the portion of the adjusted excess-profits net income not taken by the excess-profits tax is subjected to the normal tax and surtax.
>
> The bill changes this method of determining the tax base by dividing the net income into two portions, one of which is subject to excess-profits tax alone, and the other of which is subject only to normal tax and surtax. Instead of deducting the excess-profits tax itself in determining the normal and surtax bases, the bill deducts, through the form of a credit against net income, the adjusted excess-profits net income, the base upon which the excess-profits tax is computed.

This fundamental change was carried out by Section 105(a), (b) and (d) of the 1942 Act. Since the adjusted excess profits net income (and not the excess profits tax) was thereafter to be deducted in determining corporate normal and surtax bases, Section 105(c) repealed Section 23(c)(2) of the Code (note 11, supra, pp. 23-24), as originally added by the 1941 Act, and amended Section 23(c)(1)(B) by including excess profits taxes among those denied deduction (Appendix A, infra, p. 36).

Subsection (e) of Section 105, entitled "Technical Amendments Made Necessary by Change in Base for Corporate Tax," in its subparagraph (3) [18] amended Section 122 of the Code by adding,

[18] (3) Computation of net operating loss deduction.—Section 122 (relating to net operating loss) is amended as follows:

(A) Subsection (a) is amended to read as follows:

"(a) Definition of Net Operating Loss.—As used in this section, the term 'net operating loss' means the excess of the deductions allowed by this chapter over the gross income, with the exceptions, additions, and limitations provided in subsection (d)."

(B) Subsection (c) is amended by striking out the parenthesis at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "and without the credit provided in section 26(e)".

(C) Subsection (d) is amended by striking out "exceptions and limitations" and inserting in lieu thereof "exceptions, additions, and limitations" and by inserting at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(6) There shall be allowed as a deduction the amount of tax imposed by Subchapter E of Chapter 2 paid or accrued within the taxable year, subject to the following rules—

"(A) No reduction in such tax shall be made by reason of the credit for income, war-profits, or excess-profits taxes paid to any foreign country or possession of the United States;

"(B) Such tax shall be computed without regard to the adjustments provided in section 734; and

"(C) Such tax, in the case of a consolidated return inter alia, the (d) (6) provision here in question. Considered in context, it seems evident that Congress contemplated no major enlargement in the allowance of deductions in general or in the net operating loss deduction in particular. Indeed, in the language of the subsection's title, it contemplated only a "Technical Amendment [s] Made Necessary by Change in Base for Corporate Tax" in the "Computation of net operating loss deduction." This thought was expressed by John O'Brien, Office of Legislative Counsel, House of Representatives, who was called upon at the outset of the Senate hearings on the 1942 bill to explain the changes made by the House in the existing law (Senate Hearings before the Committee on Finance on H. R. 7378, 77th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 34). With respect to the language here under consideration, he stated (p. 41):

> Now, the rest of the amendments in this section are purely technical amendments relating to getting rid of the deduction for excess-profits tax which is in the present law, and various other amendments particularly in connection with the net operating loss, in order to make them come out right. You see, when you change the basis of corporate tax it involves any number of miscellaneous amendments throughout in order to make it all come out straight.

As shown by their reports,[19] the committees of

> The amendments made by this section of the bill, which corresponds to section 105 of the House bill, change both the base and the rates of the corporation income tax. The change in base is made in lieu of the deduction now granted with respect to the excess profits tax imposed by chapter 2E. Section 13(a)(2) of the Code is amended to allow the amount of the adjusted excess profits net income as a credit in computing normal tax net income. This credit, as specified in section 26(e) as amended, is likewise provided under section 15(a) in determining the amount of surtax net income.

> This section makes other technical amendments required as a result of the change in the base of the corporation tax. * * * Section 122 of the Code, relating to computation of the net operating loss deduction allowed by section 23(s) of the Code, is amended so as to allow the excess profits tax paid or accrued within taxable years (subject to certain rules) as a deduction in computing net operating loss for, and net operating loss carry-over and carry-back from, such taxable years. [Emphasis added.]

The House Report was substantially the same except that it employs language appropriate only to carry-overs, since carry-backs were first introduced in the Senate bill. Hence, instead of the last paragraph of the Senate Report, the House Report (H. Rep. No. 2333, supra, p. 65 (1942-2 Cum. Bull., supra, p. 423) reads as follows:

> This section makes other technical amendments required as a result of the change in the base of the corporation tax. * * * Section 122 of the Code, relating to computation of the net operating loss deduction allowed by section 23(s) of the Code, is amended so as to allow the excess

both Houses plainly accepted this view of the limited extent of the change involved. [20]

It would not be accurate to state that the under-profits tax paid or accrued within preceding taxable years (subject to certain rules) as a deduction in computing net operating loss for, and net operating loss carry-over from, such preceding taxable years.

A leading commentator has stated with respect to subsection (d)(6) that "The purpose of this provision is a matter of conjecture and Congressional committee reports and other available data are of no assistance on the question of intent," 5 Mertens, Law of Federal Income Taxation (1953 ed.), Section 29.02, p. 364. Certainly, there is no suggestion that Congress contemplated the far-reaching consequences which would flow from taxpayer's contention that the language of (d)(6) ("paid or accrued") is to be read in a special sense.

[20] There is a further indication that the (d)(6) amendment was not meant to have more than limited scope. Senator George of the Finance Committee introduced on the floor of the Senate a new amendment to be inserted at the proper place in the bill, "intended to eliminate duplications in the section as it was written, and to clarify certain provisions of the section." 88 Cong. Record, Part 6, p. 8015. The amendment became Section 210 of the Revenue Act of 1942, adding a new subparagraph (J) to Section 711(a)(1) of the Code and a new subparagraph (L) to Section 711(a)(2) (Appendix A, infra, pp. 44-46). These new subparagraphs provide, as an adjustment to normal tax net income in arriving at excess profits net income, that in computing the net operating loss for any taxable year under Section 122(a) "no deduction shall be allowed for any excess profits tax imposed by this subchapter." The court below (R. 16-19) did not doubt that these provisions preclude the deduction of excess profits taxes paid or accrued in determining a net operating loss to be carried back for excess profits tax purposes, if the excess profits tax is computed upon excess profits net income under Section 710(a)(1)(A). (Appendix A, infra, p. 43). The court, however, thought that if the excess profits tax is computed under Section 710(a)(1)(B) (Appendix A, infra, pp. 43-44) the tax is not based on excess profits net income, and hence it held that the limitation imposed by subparagraph (J) of Section 711(a)(1) and subparagraph (L) of Section 711(a)(2) is not applicable.

BLEED THROUGH

lying Congressional purpose in adding Section 122-(d)(6) is plainly expressed in the legislative history. See Mertens' comment, note 19, supra, p. 32. But, to recapitulate, what does emerge from the legislative history is the following:

(1) The language of the new subsection had its origin in Section 23(c)(2) as amended by the 1941 Act. In the framework of that Act, a taxpayer deducted its excess profits tax for purposes of computing its other corporate taxes (normal tax and surtax). When this was altered by the 1942 Act, which authorized a different and larger deduction, and hence a new method of computing the normal tax and surtax, Section 23(c)(2) providing for deduction of excess profits tax was repealed.

(2) The reappearance of this language in Section 122(d)(6), described as one of a "number of miscellaneous amendments" of a "technical" nature "made necessary by [the] change in base for corporate tax" and required "in order to make it all come out straight" (see supra, pp. 29-31), hardly suggests that Congress contemplated a novel and far-reaching deduction of the kind which taxpayer urges—a deduction which would permit a corporation, whether on cash or accrual basis, to deduct all excess profits taxes, both paid and accrued within any taxable year, for purposes of determining its net operating loss.

Since it may be fairly stated that, whatever else was contemplated (or overlooked), there is no evidence of an express or implied intention to work a major change, the legislative history, far from supporting the view that (d)(6) should be construed without regard to the statutory definition of "paid or accrued," emphasizes the wisdom of confining the amendment within the limits of its statutorily-defined terminology.[21] The Court of Claims thus erred we believe, in concluding that it was justified in doing "violence to the letter of the Act." (R. 13.)

[21] The court below adopted precisely the contrary approach. It refused to apply the phrase "paid or accrued" as used in Section 122(d)(6) with its established meaning and thus extended the operation of the section to cases not embraced within that meaning. On the other hand, it read Section 710(a)(1)(B) with literalness in order to give indirectly to the taxpayer here benefits expressly denied directly to taxpayer by Section 711(a)(1)(J) and 711(a)(2)(L). See note 20, supra, p. 32. The court further ignored the fact that a net operating loss carry-back from 1947 to 1945 resulted in a refund to taxpayer of the entire 1945 excess profits tax paid in 1946; yet, at the same time, it has here permitted the payment of the same 1945 excess profits tax in 1946 to be carried back as a net operating loss to 1944. Inconsistently with its refusal to consider the effect of the 1947 carryback, it has then employed the reduced 1944 corporation surtax resulting from the 1946 carry-back as constituting the base for computing the limit under Section 710(a)(1)(B) of the excess profits tax which might properly be imposed for 1944. These certainly are results never contemplated by Congress.

SEC. 41—GENERAL RULE.

The net income shall be computed upon the basis of the taxpayer's annual accounting period (fiscal year or calendar year, as the case may be) in accordance with the method of accounting regularly employed in keeping the books of such taxpayer; but if no such method of accounting has been so employed, or if the method employed does not clearly reflect the income, the computation shall be made in accordance with such method as in the opinion of the Commissioner does clearly reflect the income. If the taxpayer's annual accounting period is other than a fiscal year as defined in section 48 or if the taxpayer has no annual accounting period or does not keep books, the net income shall be computed on the basis of the calendar year.

(A) [as amended by Sec. 202 (a) of the Revenue Act of 1943, c. 63, 58 Stat. 21] 95 per centum of the adjusted excess profits net income, or

(B) [as amended by Sec. 202(b) of the Revenue Act of 1943, supra] an amount which when added to the tax imposed for the taxable year under Chapter 1 (other than section 102) equals 80 per centum of the corporation surtax net income, computed under section 15 or Supplement G, as the case may be, but without regard to the credit provided in section 26 (e) (relating to income subject to the tax imposed by this subchapter), and without regard to 80 per centum of the credit provided in section 26 (h) (relating to credit for dividends paid on certain preferred stock).

(b) Definition of Adjusted Excess Profits Net Income. As used in this section, the term "adjusted excess profits net income" in the case of any taxable year means the excess profits net income (as defined in section 711) minus the sum of:

(1) [as amended by Sec. 204 of the Revenue Act of 1943, supra] Specific exemption.—A specific exemption of $10,000;

(2) Excess profits credit.—The amount of the excess profits credit allowed under section 712; and

(3) [as amended by Sec. 2 (a) of the Excess-Profits Tax Amendments of 1941, c. 10, 55 Stat. 17, and Sec. 204 (a) of the Revenue Act of 1942, supra] Unused excess profits credit.—The amount of the unused excess profits credit adjustment for the taxable year, computed in accordance with subsection (c).

Sec. 29.41-1. Computation of Net Income.—

* * * * *

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

* * * The time as of which any item of gross income or any deduction is to be accounted for must be determined in the light of the fundamental rule that the computation shall be made in such a manner as clearly reflects the taxpayer's income. If the method of accounting regularly employed by him in keeping his books clearly reflects his income, it is to be followed with respect to the time as of which items of gross income and deductions are to be accounted for. (See sections 29.42-1 to 29.42-3, inclusive.) If the taxpayer does not regularly employ a method of accounting which clearly reflects his income, the computation shall be made in such manner as in the opinion of the Commissioner clearly reflects it.

Sec. 29.41-2. Bases of Computation and Changes in Accounting Methods.—Approved standard methods of accounting will ordinarily be regarded as clearly reflecting income. A method of accounting will not, however, be regarded as clearly reflecting income unless all items of gross income and all deductions are treated with reasonable consistency. See section 48 for definitions of "paid or accrued" and "paid or incurred." All items of gross income shall be included in the gross income for the taxable year in which they are received by the taxpayer, and deductions taken accordingly, unless in order clearly to reflect income such amounts are to be properly accounted for as of a different period. But see sections 42 and 43. See also section 48. * * *

* * * * *

Sec. 29.43-1. "Paid or Incurred" and "Paid or Accrued."—(a) The terms "paid or incurred" and "paid or accrued" will be construed according to the method of accounting upon the basis of which the net income is computed by the taxpayer. (See section 48 (c).) The deductions and credits provided for in chapter 1 (other than the dividends paid credit provided in section 27) must be taken for the taxable year in which "paid or accrued" or "paid or incurred," unless in order clearly to reflect the income such deductions or credits should be taken as of a different period. If a taxpayer desires to claim a deduction or a credit as of a period other than the period in which it was "paid or accrued" or "paid or incurred," he shall attach to his return a statement setting forth his request for consideration of the case by the Commissioner together with a complete statement of the facts upon which he relies. However, in his income tax return he shall take the deduction or credit only for the taxable period in which it was actually "paid or incurred," or "paid or accrued," as the case may be. Upon the audit of the return, the Commissioner will decide whether the case is within the exception provided by the Internal Revenue Code, and the taxpayer will be advised as to the period for which the deduction or credit is properly allowable.

* * * * *

Sec. 29.122-1. Net Operating Loss Deduction.—(a) General.—Section 122 provides the rules for the computation of the net operating loss deduction allowed by section 23 (s). The net operating loss deduction is the aggregate of the net operating loss carry-overs and carry-backs to the taxable year, reduced by certain adjustments to prevent the deduction of losses absorbed by income not taxed.

* * * * *

A fractional part of a year which is a taxable year under section 48 (a) is a preceding or succeeding taxable year for the purpose of determining under section 122 the first, second, or third preceding taxable year or the first or second succeeding taxable year.

* * * * *

(b) Steps in computation of net operating loss deduction.—There are three steps in the ascertainment of the net operating loss deduction. The first step is the computation of the net operating loss, if any, for the two preceding taxable years and for the two succeeding taxable years. The second is the computation of the net operating loss carry-overs to the taxable year from such preceding taxable years and the computation of the net operating loss carry-backs to the taxable year from such succeeding taxable years. The third is the conversion of the aggregate of such net operating loss carry-overs and carry-backs into the net operating loss deduction.

* * * * *

Sec. 29.122-2. Computation of Net Operating Loss In Case Of Corporation.—A net operating loss is sustained by a corporation in any taxable year if and to the extent that, for such year, there is an excess of deductions allowed by chapter 1 over gross income, both computed with the following exceptions, additions, and limitations:

(1) The deduction for depletion shall not exceed the amount which would be allowable if computed without reference to discovery value or to percentage depletion under section 114 (b) (2), (3), or (4);

(2) There shall be included in computing gross income the amount of interest received which is wholly exempt from the taxes imposed by chapter 1, decreased by the amount of interest paid or accrued which is not allowed as a deduction by section 23 (b), relating to interest on indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry certain tax-exempt obligations;

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(3) No net operating loss deduction shall be allowed;

(4) For any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1938, and before January 1, 1942, the amount deductible on account of long-term capital losses shall not exceed the amount includible on account of long-term capital gains, and the amount deductible on account of short-term capital losses shall not exceed the amount includible on account of short-term capital gains. For any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1941, the amount deductible on account of losses from sales or exchanges of capital assets shall not exceed the amount includible on account of gains from sales or exchanges of such assets; and

(5) For taxable years beginning after December 31, 1941, there shall be allowed as a deduction the amount of excess profits tax imposed by subchapter E of chapter 2 paid or accrued within the taxable year, subject, however, to the provisions of section 122 (d) (6) (A), (B), and (C).

The application of this section may be illustrated by the following example:

Example. For the year 1942 the X Corporation, which makes its income tax returns on the calendar year basis, has gross income as defined in section 22 of $400,000 and deductions allowed by section 23 of $600,000, exclusive of any net operating loss deduction. Included in gross income are long-term capital gains of $50,000 and short-term capital gains of $25,000. The corporation had long-term capital losses of $60,000 and short-term capital losses of $35,000, which are deductible to the extent of the capital gains, or $75,000.

The X Corporation also deducted $75,000 for depletion on a percentage basis. If depletion had been computed without reference to percentage depletion, the amount of such deduction would have been $5,000. For 1942 the X Corporation also had $35,000 of wholly tax-exempt interest, and paid $15,000 in interest on indebtedness incurred to carry the obligations from which such tax-exempt interest was derived.

On the basis of these facts the X Corporation has a net operating loss for the year 1942 of $110,000, computed as follows:

(1)	Deductions for 1942		$600,000
	Less:
(2)	Excess of percentage depletion over cost ($75,000 minus $5,000)		70,000
(3)	Deductions adjusted as required by section 122 (d) (item (1) minus item (2))		530,000
(4)	Gross income for 1942	$400,000
(5)	Plus tax-exempt interest minus interest paid ($35,000 minus $15,000)	20,000

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(6) Gross income adjusted as required by section 122 (d) (item (4) plus item (5))	420,000

OPINIONS BELOW

The opinion of the Court of Claims on plaintiff's and defendant's motions for summary judgment, and the dissenting opinions were entered November 4, 1952. Judgment was entered the same day. (R. 10-14). These opinions are reported at 108 F. Supp. 109. The opinion of the Court of Claims denying defendant's motion for rehearing, and the dissenting opinions were entered March 3, 1953. (R. 16-19). These opinions are reported at 110 F. Supp. 600.

JURISDICTION

The opinion and judgment of the Court of Claims were entered November 4, 1952. (R. 14.) On December 3, 1952, the Government filed a motion for rehearing. On March 3, 1953, the court denied the motion. (R. 19.) On May 29, 1953, application for writ of certiorari was filed by the petitioner. Petitioner invokes the jurisdiction of this Court under 28 U.S.C., Section 1255 (1). The respondent contends that jurisdiction does not lie in this proceeding for failure to file a timely petition within the meaning of 28 U.S.C., Section 2101 (c).

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. Was the petition for a writ of certiorari timely filed?

2. Did the Court of Claims err in construing the intent of Congress to be that the phrase "paid or accrued", appearing in Section 122(d)(6) of the Internal Revenue Code, did not refer to methods of accounting and, therefore, permits an accrual basis taxpayer to take as a deduction the amount of excess profits tax paid in 1946 in computing the net operating loss for that year?

STATUTES INVOLVED

The pertinent provisions of the Internal Revenue Code here applicable, are set forth in the Appendix, infra, pp. 17-20.

STATEMENT

This case was submitted to the Court of Claims on motions for summary judgment filed by both parties, together with supporting affidavits. The undisputed facts are briefly as follows:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The taxpayer, a New York Corporation, was and is a manufacturer of television and radio receiving sets, with its office and principal place of business at 34-01 38th Avenue, Long Island City, New York. Plaintiff kept its books and accounts on the accrual basis and filed its Federal corporation tax returns on the same basis using a calendar year (R. 1).

The taxpayer's Federal corporation income tax return, filed for the calendar year 1946, disclosed no income tax liability and reflected a net operating loss for the year 1946 of $324,844.23. Upon audit of this tax return, the Bureau of Internal Revenue reduced the net operating loss for the year 1946 to $310,872.60, to which the taxpayer agreed. The latter amount neither included nor reflected any adjustment or addition on account of excess profits taxes paid by the taxpayer to the Collector of Internal Revenue in 1946, within the meaning of 122(d)(6) of the Internal Revenue Code. (R. 2, 11.)

Within the calendar year 1946, taxpayer paid a total of $263,272.80 in excess profits taxes to the Collector of Internal Revenue. (R. 2.)

On or about June 11, 1948, taxpayer filed a claim for refund of income and excess profits taxes for the year 1944 with the Collector of Internal Revenue, said claim being in the face amount of $191,004.04. That refund claim was based upon the provisions of Section 122(d)(6) of the Internal Revenue Code, and asserted the taxpayer's right, in computing the correct net operating loss for 1946, to include the sum of excess profits taxes actually paid by the taxpayer to the Collector of Internal Revenue within 1946. (R. 2, 3, 11.)

Upon the failure of the Collector of Internal Revenue to take any action with respect to said refund claim within six months after the filing of said claim, the taxpayer filed petition in the United States Court of Claims on June 14, 1952 (R. 1-3).

On November 4, 1952, the Court of Claims promulgated its opinion granting the taxpayer's motion for summary judgment, and denying the defendant's motion for summary judgment. Judgment was thereupon entered on the same day in the taxpayer's favor in the sum of $148,-841.72, with interest as provided by law. The opinion of the Court of Claims held that the taxpayer was entitled to include as a deduction in computing its 1946 net operating loss, the amount of excess profits taxes paid in 1946 under the provisions of Section 122(d)(6) of the Internal Revenue Code. (R. 10-14.)

REASONS FOR DENYING THE WRIT

The respondent advances the following contentions as reasons for denying the writ: 1) the petition for writ of certiorari was not timely filed; 2) the decision below is clearly correct; 3) there is no conflict of decision; and 4) there is no important issue involved.

I

PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI WAS NOT TIMELY FILED

The issue of timeliness of a petition for certiorari is not a new one in this Court. A recent decision of this Court, Federal Trade Commission v. Minneapolis Honeywell Regulator Company, (1952) 344 U. S. 205, contains a pertinent discussion of this problem by the Chief Justice.

After observing that the petitioner's interpretation of this Court's prior decisions was too liberal, the Chief Justice stated:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> "While it may be true that the Court of Appeals had the power to supersede the judgment of July 5, with a new one, it is also true, as that court itself has recognized, that the time within which a losing party must seek review, cannot be enlarged just because the lower court in its decision thinks it should be enlarged. Thus the mere fact that a judgment previously entered, has been re-entered or revised in an immaterial way, does not toll the time within which review must be sought. Only when the lower court changes matters of substance, or resolves a genuine ambiguity in a judgment previously rendered, should the period within which an appeal must be taken, or a petition for certiorari filed begin to run anew. The test is a practical one. The question is whether the lower court, in its second order has disturbed or revised legal rights and obligations, which by its prior judgment had been plainly and properly settled with finality."

The opinion in the cited case, closes with the admonition to heed the principle that "litigation must at some definite point be brought to an end."

Applying the principles just stated to the present proceeding, the opinion of the Court of Claims was rendered on November 4, 1952. On that date judgment was also entered, as ordered, in the plaintiff's favor against the defendant in the amount of $148,871.72, with interest. That opinion and decision is the one from which the petitioner here seeks to appeal. On December 3, 1952, the defendant below filed motion for re-hearing with the Court of Claims. That motion was opposed by the plaintiff below, in part based upon the averment that the defendant's brief in support of its motion for re-hearing failed to advance any significantly new and different arguments from those already presented to the Court of Claims.

On February 3, 1953, the motion for re-hearing was argued. On March 3, 1953, the Court of Claims rendered its opinion on defendant's motion for re-hearing. That opinion concluded with the statement "The judgment heretofore entered in the sum of $148,841.72 will stand."

A reading of the opinion of March 3, 1953, discloses that it is confined to the very narrow question of whether or not the distinction which had been made by the taxpayer between Section 710(a)(1)(B) and Section 710(a)(1)(A) was valid. The same point had been argued in the original briefs, and reply briefs in the Court of Claims proceeding, and also had been raised during oral argument. While it is true that the opinion of the Court of Claims of November 4, 1952, is silent on this matter and that its opinion of March 3, 1953, treats it in detail, the fact remains that the opinion of March 3, 1953, does not "change matters of substance." Nor does it resolve a genuine ambiguity. It is obvious that the Court of Claims' second opinion, neither disturbed nor revised any legal rights or obligations, settled by its prior opinion and judgment. See also Department of Banking v. Pink, (1952) 317 U.S. 264.

The principle enunciated in Federal Trade Commission v. Minneapolis Honeywell Regulator Company, supra, should apply in this instance. The 90-day period within which the defendant below could have applied for a writ of certiorari expired on February 2, 1953. 28 U.S.C. Sec. 2101(c). Petition for writ of certiorari was filed on May 29, 1953.

Recognition of the respondent's argument on this point would not mean that a losing party in the Court of Claims, in a situation such as this would be left without a remedy. The defendant below could have applied for an extension of time from a Judge of this Court, 28 U.S.C., Sec. 2101(c), or it could have filed a timely petition for a writ of certiorari as a protective measure.

The fact that the application for certiorari under consideration was filed on May 29, 1953, requires the conclusion that such application was not timely filed.

DECISION BELOW IS CLEARLY CORRECT

The Court of Claims proceeding involving this taxpayer presented a novel tax issue to that court. At the nub of the problem presented, was the necessity of construing the phrase "paid or accrued", appearing in Section 122 (d)(6) of the Internal Revenue Code. The taxpayer contended that these words should receive their usual commercial sense.[1] That is, "paid" meant liquidation of an outstanding tax liability by actual payment and "accrued" meant the coming into existence of such a liability. The respondent below contended that these words referred to methods of accounting. The Court of Claims accepted the former contention and found for the taxpayer.

Three fundamental lines of reasoning support the result reached by the Court of Claims. These are: First, the legislative antecedents and history of Section 122(d)(6) lead to that conclusion; second, the same result has been reached in an analogous situation[1]; and third, the contention of the defendant below leads to such incongruous and inequitable results that such results could not have been intended by Congress.

With reference to the first proposition, Section 122(d)(6) was inserted in the Internal Revenue Code by Section 105(c)(3) of the 1942 Revenue Act. It was made effective for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1941.

In 1940, Section 23(c) of the Internal Revenue Code as it then read, permitted a direct deduction against net income for taxes paid or accrued within the taxable year, with certain exceptions. Included among those exceptions, were excess profits taxes. Section 202(a) of the

[1] See Commissioner v. Clarion Oil Company, (CCA DC 1945), 148 F. (2d) 671, cert. den. 325 U.S. 881.

Revenue Act of 1941, removed excess profits taxes under Chapter 2E, from the list of exceptions to the general deduction rule contained in Section 23(c) of the Code. Simultaneously, the Revenue Act of 1941 added new subparagraph (2) to Section 23(c), which permitted a direct deduction in computing net income for excess profits taxes paid or accrued within the taxable year, subject to certain limiting rules. Rule A of subparagraph (2) effectively placed all taxpayers on the accrual basis of accounting with respect to the excess profits tax payments described.[2]

The Revenue Act of 1942, by Section 105(c), repealed Internal Revenue Code, Section 23(c)(2), and, simultaneously, restored excess profits taxes to the list of exceptions to the deduction rule permitted by Section 23(c). Thus, the right of deduction formerly accorded to excess profits taxes paid or accrued was withdrawn by the 1942 Revenue Act.

The very same section of the 1942 Revenue Act, which restored excess profits taxes to the list of exceptions to the tax deduction provision, added the new provision—Section 122(d)(6)—to the Internal Revenue Code.

The only pertinent Congressional language is the following:[3]

> "Section 122 of the Code relating to computation of the net operating loss deduction allowed by 122(c) of the Code is amended so as to allow excess profits tax paid or accrued within taxable years (subject to certain rules) as a deduction in computing net operating loss for, and net operating loss carry over and carry back from, such taxable years."

---

[2] Rule (A) read as follows: "(A) The deductions shall be limited to the tax imposed for the taxable year but any portion of such tax paid after the taxable year shall be considered as having been paid within the taxable year;"

Rules (A), (B) and (C) in Section 122(d)(6) are almost verbatim copies of Rules (B), (C) and (D) formerly appearing in Section 23(e)(2). Significantly, Rule (A) under the latter section, which had effectively placed all taxpayers on the accrual basis, does not appear as a Rule under Section 122(d)(6). The question thus arises as to the significance of the apparently deliberate omission of Rule (A) of Section 23(e)(2) from the Rules contained under Section 122(d)(6). The maxim, inclusio unius est exclusio alterius suggests that the Congress, by the enactment of Section 122(d)(6) omitting Rule (A), did not intend to place all taxpayers on the accrual basis.

Can it be validly assumed that by the omission of Rule (A), Congress intended to place each taxpayer upon the basis of its own method of accounting? At first blush, it might appear that such meaning would be in accord with the definition of "paid or accrued" contained in Section 48(e) and hence the deduction would be controlled by Section 43. However, both sections have reference to "net income" and Section 43 refers to "deductions." Technically, neither concept is here involved.

Subparagraph 6 of Section 122(d) as well as the other 5 adjustments under Section 122(d) are all designed to convert net income or net operating loss, respectively, into economic net income, or economic net loss, as the case may be.[4] When Section 122(d)(6) is read in conjunction with Section 122(a), the effect is that a net operating loss becomes economic net loss. The payment of excess profits taxes in 1946 by the taxpayer was a true economic loss to the taxpayer in that year.

[4] See 5 Mertens, Law of Federal Income Taxation, 305-6, Sec. 29.02.

After a net operating loss (Section 122(a)) has been converted into economic net loss (Section 122(d)), that economic net loss is what is carried back and applied to prior years. When that loss is carried back and converted into a net operating loss deduction (Section 122 (c)), the net income of the year of application itself first must be converted into economic net income. Section 122(c). Thus net income, as such, is not ultimately involved either in the loss year or year of deduction. That this distinction between net income and some other statutory concept such as economic net income is not a super-refined legalism is illustrated in a parallel situation involving the distinction between net income and subchapter A net income. Compare Commissioner v. Clarion Oil Company, supra.

One other point is significant in this regard. Conventional deductions, as such, are not involved. What is involved is a tax. The coming into existence of a liability for a tax is referred to by the word "accrued." The liquidation of a pre-existing tax liability by actual payment is referred to by the word "paid." The heading of Section 122(d) refers to "Exceptions, additions and limitations", not "deductions." The only one of these three words which could be applicable in the computation of a net operating loss where Section 122(d)(6) is involved is the word "additions." This refers to the amount of excess profits taxes "paid or accrued" which are to be added to the net operating loss otherwise computed.

The parallel type of situation referred to above, is illustrated by such cases as Commissioner v. Clarion Oil Company, supra; Birmingham et al, Exrs. v. The Loetscher Company, (C.C.A. 8 1951) 188 F. (2d) 78; Aramo Siftima v. Commissioner, (C.C.A. 2 1949) 172 F. (2d) 896; Wm. J. Lemp Brewing Company, (1952) 18 T.C. ....., No. 70. All of these cases demonstrate that where "net income" is not specifically involved, Sections 43 and 48(c) of the Internal Revenue Code are not controlling. They, therefore, also stand for the proposition that in such a case the phrase "paid or accrued" does not refer to accounting methods but rather refers to the liquidation of a tax liability or the coming into existence of such a liability. In these respects, the cited cases closely parallel the present proceeding.

The final reason for the correctness of the Court of Claims decision becomes apparent from a brief consideration of the effect of the petitioner's argument with respect to the proper meaning of the quoted phrases. This will illustrate the inequitable and discriminatory results flowing from the petitioner's construction of "paid or accrued." Fundamentally, every corporate taxpayer regardless of its method of accounting, must file its return within 2½ months after the close of its taxable year. The liability for tax reflected on such return is required to be paid in four quarterly installments during the year following the return year. This is the usual or conventional way in which a corporate taxpayer liquidates its liabilities for tax, regardless of accounting methods. A cash basis corporation, paying its prior year's excess profits tax liability in a loss year would, under the petitioner's theory, always would be entitled to make the Section 122(d)(6) adjustment while an accrual basis taxpayer in the identical situation would not.

If, as contended for by the petitioner, the phrase "paid or accrued" refers to accounting methods then it follows that it is virtually impossible for any accrual basis taxpayer to derive benefit from Section 122(d)(6) in such a situation. While it is mathematically possible it is almost impossible as a practical matter for an accrual basis taxpayer to incur a net operating loss under Chapter I of the Internal Revenue Code, and in the same year incur an excess profits tax liability under Chapter 2E of the Internal Revenue Code to be accrued. Nearly all corporate taxpayers compute net income on the accrual basis of accounting. They would be foreclosed in a normal situation while the very few cash basis taxpayers would all benefit.[5] It can scarcely be argued that Congress intended such a discriminatory and inequitable result. The taxpayer's interpretation of the words in question, would benefit either a cash basis or an accrual basis taxpayer equally where either had a loss year following a profit year in which an excess profits tax liability arose. It was this basic equitable consideration which apparently weighed heavily in the Court of Claims and induced it to find for the taxpayer.

The Court of Claims chose to premise its findings on the ground that it was necessary to make an exception in this case to the general rule prohibiting the shifting from the "paid" to the "accrued" basis or vice versa. The Court of Claims, in taking that position, did so in order to reach a result giving effect to the plain "intention of Congress."

[5] There is an unusual type of situation which can also arise. That is where additional taxes, deficiencies, are involved. If there is a dispute as to the liability for these additional taxes which postpones accrual and such dispute continues to and is settled in a loss year then, under either party's theory of "accrued," the result would be the same for an accrual basis taxpayer. Compare GCM 25298, 1947-2 Cum. Bull. 39.

If a cash basis taxpayer were involved, and no payment was made in the settlement year then under the respondent's theory there would be no proper Section 122(d)(6) adjustment; under the taxpayer's theory the tax would "accrue" and be a proper adjustment.

If the additional tax liability settled was also paid to the Collector in the same year settled, then under either theory Section 122(d)(6) would apply. The payment as well as the settlement would fix the time of accrual under respondent's accounting method theory. Robert Reis & Co., (1953) 20 T.C. — No. 36, and, under taxpayer's theory, both actual liquidation of a liability and the coming into existence of a liability would have occurred.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

There would appear to be another equally valid rationalization supporting the Court of Claims' result which would avoid the necessity of ignoring the rule against shifting bases. That alternative, as contended for by the taxpayer, is that the phrase "paid or accrued" is ambiguous, being susceptible of the two different constructions previously mentioned. In the presence of such ambiguity, the Court of Claims properly exercised its judicial prerogative and resolved the ambiguity, by ascertaining the Congressional intent. That intent was that the taxpayer should be permitted to carry back a net operating loss to a former year, and that to this loss there should be added excess profits taxes "paid or accrued" in the loss year. As previously shown, the payment of an excess profits tax is an economic loss, which increases the loss permitted to be carried back under Section 122(d)(6).

THERE IS NO CONFLICT OF DECISION

The petitioner here makes the point that the decision of the Court of Claims involving this taxpayer is directly in conflict with certain decisions of the Tax Court of the United States. That being so, such a situation does not create that kind of a conflict in which this court normally grants a writ of certiorari. Nowhere in this Court's Rule 38(5) is there any reference to a conflict between the Court of Claims and The Tax Court of the United States. The latter court is, of course, only an administrative agency, a part of the Executive Branch of the Government. Edward D. Whitehead v. U. S., decided January 13, 1953, Court of Claims No. 49572.

While it is clear that a writ of certiorari can issue where there is a direct conflict of decisions between a Court of Appeals and the Court of Claims, Helvering v.

the International Life Insurance Company, (1935) 294 U.S. 686, 689, the respondent has been unable, despite diligent search, to find a single case in which a conflict between the Tax Court of the United States on the one hand, and the Court of Claims or a Court of Appeals on the other has resulted in the issuance of a writ of certiorari by this Court.

The Circuit Courts of Appeal, and the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia have exclusive jurisdiction to review decisions of the Tax Court of the United States. Title 26 U.S.C., Section 1141. There is a theoretical possibility in the future that a bona fide conflict might develop, which might warrant an exercise of this Court's discretion in issuing a writ of certiorari. That might occur should the taxpayers against whom decisions were rendered in the Tax Court involving Section 122(d)(6) appeal to some Circuit Court of Appeals and that court sustained the Tax Court. However, an attempt at this time to invoke the authority of this Court appears to be premature.

Even if it be assumed that the conflict between the Tax Court of the United States and the Court of Claims is that kind of conflict in which certiorari may issue, then that fact, in and of itself, does not warrant the inevitable conclusion that this court must grant certiorari. See Robert L. Stern, Denial of Certiorari Despite a Conflict, Harvard Law Review, January, 1953.

This proceeding does not involve that kind of matter in which the Court of Claims has exclusive jurisdiction over some unique type of statutory proceeding. Tax matters are certainly not unique, and the Court of Claims does not have exclusive jurisdiction thereof.

THERE IS NO IMPORTANT ISSUE INVOLVED

The petitioner states (p. 5), that it is informed by the Treasury Department, that the same issue is presented in at least 35 (and probably more) other cases, now pending before various courts and the Treasury Department, involving $27 million in taxes, plus interest. Aside from the fact that this unsupported allegation should receive no consideration, it seems clear that under this court's previous decisions, such facts, even if true, do not furnish adequate grounds for certiorari.

Where large amounts of money are involved, such a fact may be persuasive for certiorari although normally not so unless the amount is enormous. See U. S. v. Zazove, (1948) 334 U. S. 602, 613-14, Note 17. The principle at issue in that case could have involved billions of dollars. The number of individuals affected by a decision may be persuasive. One example of this type of situation is Patterson v. Lamb, (1947) 329 U. S. 539. In that case thousands of World War I draftees were directly affected. There is in this case no such pressure of equity.

Where a lower court's decision is at variance with well established administrative construction, certiorari may issue. U. S. v. Ruzicka, (1946) 329 U. S., 287. There a review was granted where a lower court's decision upset 25 years of consistent rulings and practice by the War Department. Here there is no well established administrative construction such as existed in the case cited.

If the Court of Claims decision be assumed to be in error as a matter of law, then that fact alone would not warrant the issue of the writ. This Court is not primarily concerned with the correction of errors in lower court decisions. Hence, it generally will not grant certiorari just because the decision below may be erroneous. See Supreme Court Practice, Robert L. Stern, Eugene Gressman, Bureau of International Affairs, Inc., 1950, p. 113.

Section 304(e) of the Excess Profits Tax Act of 1950 made Internal Revenue Code Section 122(d)(6) inapplicable with respect to taxable years ending after June 30, 1950. Therefore, the present issue is not a recurring one and can involve only the years ending prior to June 30, 1950. The significance of the highly technical issue here involved has only a comparatively narrow scope even in its broadest implications.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons above stated, the petition for writ of certiorari to the United States Court of Claims in this proceeding should be denied.

Respectfully submitted

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1954

No. 10

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Petitioner,

v.

OLYMPIC RADIO AND TELEVISION, INC., Respondent

On Writ of Certiorari to the United States Court of Claims

BRIEF FOR THE RESPONDENT

OPINIONS BELOW

The original Opinion of the Court of Claims together with the dissenting opinion (R. 10-14) is reported in 108 F. Supp. 109. The supplemental Opinion with dissent (R. 16-19) is reported in 110 F. Supp. 600.

JURISDICTION

The Court of Claims' judgment was entered November 4, 1952 (R. 10, 14). The Government filed a motion for rehearing on December 3, 1952 (R. 14) which was denied in the supplemental Opinion decided March 3, 1953 (R. 16). On May 29, 1953, the Government filed a petition for writ of certiorari which was allowed October 14, 1954 (R. 21). The Court's jurisdiction of this controversy is founded on 28 U. S. C., Section 1255(1).

QUESTION PRESENTED

In 1946, the taxpayer's deductions exceeded its gross income by $310,872.60. It paid the Collector of Internal Revenue $263,272.80 in excess profits taxes within the year 1946. Taxpayer added the latter amount to the $310,872.60 under Section 122(d)(6) of the Internal Revenue Code[1] and carried-back the aggregate of $574,145.40 to the year 1944 as a net operating loss deduction[2] in the latter year. Section 122(d)(6) required the addition of excess profits taxes "paid or accrued"[3] within 1946 to the excess of deductions over gross income in that year in determining the amount of the 1946 net operating loss. The question is: Should the taxpayer be denied the right to take into account excess profits taxes paid in 1946 in computing the amount of the 1946 net operating loss under Section 122 (d)(6) because: (a) it used the accrual method of accounting or because, (b) the taxpayer happened to incur a net operating loss in 1947 which, when carried back to 1945, resulted in refunds or credits to the taxpayer of the excess profits taxes for the year 1945 paid in 1946.

[1] Unless otherwise noted references to the "Code" or the "Internal Revenue Code" relate to the "Internal Revenue Code of 1939".

[2] There is no dispute as to the carry-back of the $310,872.60. and its allowance as a deduction in 1944; credits or refunds of a portion of the 1944 taxes were made as a result of the allowance of such a deduction. The dispute relates only to the tax effect of the additional amount of $263,270.80 included by the taxpayer in the gross amount of net operating loss claimed under Section 122 (d) (6). If allowed, the net operating loss carry-back and finally the deduction will be increased pro tanto.

[3] In this proceeding there is only a "paid" issue; there is no present issue involving taxes "accrued". See R. 5.

STATUTES INVOLVED

Pertinent Code Provisions are printed in full in Appendix A, pp. 47 to 60.

Provisions of certain Revenue Acts and prior Code provisions are also printed in Appendix A.

STATEMENT

This Federal tax refund suit was submitted to the Court of Claims on motions for summary judgment together with supporting affidavits filed by both parties. The undisputed facts are briefly as follows:

The taxpayer, a corporation chartered in New York State and engaged in the manufacture of radio and television receiving sets, kept its books and accounts on the accrual basis and filed its Federal corporation tax returns on the same basis, using a calendar year (R. 1, 3).

The taxpayer's Federal corporation income tax return filed for the year 1946 disclosed no tax liability, reflecting instead a net operating loss of $324,844.23. Subsequent audit of this return by the Bureau of Internal Revenue reduced this loss to $310,872.60 to which the taxpayer agreed. (R. 2, 3, 11)

As provided by statute, the loss of $310,872.60 was carried back to the year 1944 where, allowed as a net operating loss deduction in that year, it produced overpayments of tax which were credited or refunded to the taxpayer (R. 5, 11).

In the year 1946 taxpayer had paid $263,272.80 in excess profits taxes with respect to its excess profits tax liability for the year 1945 (R. 2, 9). In June, 1948, taxpayer filed a claim for refund of additional income and excess profits taxes for the year 1944 based upon the provisions of Section 122(d)(6) of the Internal Revenue Code. That claim was predicated on the contention that the taxpayer was entitled to include the sum of excess profits taxes actually paid within 1946 in determining the amount of net operating loss for 1946 and the corresponding deduction in 1944. (R. 2, 3, 11)

Failure of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to take action with respect to said refund claim for more than six months after the filing thereof authorized the taxpayer to file petition in the United States Court of Claims on June 14, 1952 (R. 1-3). In that Court, the taxpayer abandoned some of its contentions[4] and sued for a refund of $148,841.72[5] in excess profits tax for 1944 with interest as provided by law. (R. 5, 10,14)

The Court of Claims held for the taxpayer and found that it was entitled to include the amount of excess profits taxes paid in 1946 in computing the amount of its 1946 net operating loss under the provisions of Section 122(d)(6) of the Internal Revenue Code (R. 10-14.) In so holding the Court ruled that "paid or accrued" used in that Section must be construed as permitting a deduction for excess profits taxes paid even though the taxpayer used the accrual basis. (R. 12-13, 16) The majority of the Court of Claims (with two dissents) found that this construction of Section 122(d)(6) was in accord with the clear intention of Congress (R. 10-14). On rehearing the same majority of the Court of Claims (with the same dissents) adhered to its original decision (R. 16-19).

[4] The abandoned contention related to an argument that $86,333.74 of excess profits tax accrued in the year 1946, arising out of the settlement of a dispute by agreement to a deficiency in excess profits tax in that amount. (R. 5, 7)

[5] This amount was based upon a "paid" theory only and is the amount stated in the petition to the Court of Claims. Actually, that amount is less than the proper amount refundable to the taxpayer on the basis of the holding by the Court of Claims. Due to an inadvertent error in the arithmetic computation of the effect of the additional deduction in 1944 the amount recoverable was understated in the petition. As recomputed by the taxpayer, the proper result in 1944 is an overpayment of excess profits tax of $116,425.80 and an overpayment of income tax of $53,729.41, or an aggregate overpayment of $170,155.21.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

How should "paid or accrued" formerly appearing in Section 122(d)(6) of the Code be construed? Did the words connote accounting methods? Or did they refer to tax transactions, namely, actual tax payment, or that a liability for tax had arisen?

I

As a first method the taxpayer takes a practical approach, letting the results under the opposing theories point the way to the legislative purpose and proper construction. The taxpayer construes "paid or accrued" to refer to transactions involving either payment or the arise of a liability while the Government construes the words to refer to accounting methods. Under the Government's construction, of course, "paid" relates to a cash basis taxpayer and "accrued" relates to an accrual basis taxpayer.

Excess profits tax liabilities for 1945 were conventionally paid during the following year regardless of accounting methods. If 1945 was a profit year and was followed by a loss year then excess profits taxes would be paid in a loss year. Taxpayer regards this as the situation envisaged by Section 122(d)(6); it would apply to any taxpayer regardless of accounting methods. This is the ordinary case.

Unlike this equitable result the Government's construction results in gross discrimination against the bulk of corporate taxpayers who report on the accrual basis and favors the comparatively few cash basis taxpayers. If "paid" is confined to a method of accounting then obviously the cash basis taxpayer could pay its tax in a loss year. Conversely, an accrual basis taxpayer under identical circumstances would derive no benefit as its taxes would have accrued in the prior (tax) year and payment would be meaningless. Nor could the accrual basis taxpayer accrue an excess profits tax liability for the loss year itself. As a practical matter it was impossible to have a net operating loss under Chapter 1 (income tax) and at the same time have an excess profits tax liability under Chapter 2. The unusual type of situation was one where a tax deficiency was contested postponing accrual and settlement occurred in a loss year. Under those circumstances an excess profits tax liability could accrue in a loss year under either party's theory. This, however, it must be emphasized was an unusual type of situation of limited applicability whereas the payment situation was ordinary for all taxpayers.

The Court below and even the Second Circuit have recognized the inequitable situation inherent in the Government's argument. This type of inequity is to be distinguished from the ordinary differences found between taxpayers arising from different accounting methods. Those disadvantages were temporary while the discrimination here was permanent. Recalling that the net operating loss provisions were essentially relief provisions designed to help taxpayers by permitting them to spread losses, it is inconceivable that Congress in that process deliberately intended to discriminate against the great bulk of corporate taxpayers in an ordinary situation. Congress must be presumed to have intended "equality among taxpayers", and only the taxpayer's transactional concept achieves such a result.

II

Congress did not define the words "paid or accrued" when used in Section 122(d)(6). The meaning of these words, however, may be gleaned by analyzing the provisions of the statute themselves, by analyzing the legislative history to determine legislative intent, and finally on the authority of a related line of cases. The foregoing sources lead to the conclusion that Section 122(d)(6) was designed to permit corporate taxpayers regardless of accounting methods to take as a deduction the amount of excess profits tax paid in a loss year in determining the amount of the net operating loss.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Of all the adjustments under Section 122(d), the (6) adjustment, the one here involved, was the only one intended to help a taxpayer where a net operating loss had been incurred. All of the others tended to reduce the amount of the loss. The (6) adjustment was the "addition" referred to in the caption of Section 122(d) as it "added to" the amount of the loss.

Although Congress used the word "deduction" in Section 122(d)(6) it is clear that the word as used there was not used in a conventional sense, as under Section 23, for example. Section 23(c)(1)(B) of the Code specifically made excess profits taxes non-deductible in determining net income in 1946. This provision had been added by the same section of the Revenue Act of 1942 which added 122(d)(6) to the Code.

Taxpayer concludes, therefore, that as a conventional deduction was not intended, Congress must have designed the adjustment to permit the "addition" of excess profits taxes either paid or accrued in the loss year to the amount of the net operating loss just as if they had been deductions for this limited purpose. This renders the Government's argument on deduction wholly inapposite.

The technique used in Section 122(d)(6), while somewhat out of the ordinary, was similar to a technique used by Congress in a number of other Code provisions in effect at the same time. The other Code provisions were those relating to foreign personal holding companies, domestic personal holding companies, improper accumulations of surplus and even the excess profits tax itself. Each of these "super-surtaxes" plugging loopholes was levied upon a tax base derived from but different from net income. Conventionally, a number of adjustments were made, differing among the various sections, to convert net income to the respective tax base concerned in each of the differing sections. In both of the personal holding company sections as well as the one involving improper accumulations of surplus, otherwise non-deductible Federal taxes were required to reduce net income under language which in each case described such taxes as "paid or accrued during the taxable year". Those cases construing these provisions such as Commissioner v. Clarion Oil Company, 148 F. (2d) 671, in the case of personal holding companies, have uniformly held that "paid or accrued" referred to transactions and not accounting methods. In each case the rationale was that accounting methods were connoted by paid or accrued under Section 48(c) only where net income was involved. Adjustments made to net income after it had been determined were not controlled by these terms which were to receive their ordinary meaning.

The parallel between these types of adjustments and that involved under 122(d)(6) is striking. In the situation here involved net loss (excess of deductions over gross income or negative net income) was to be adjusted for the "exceptions, additions and limitations" of subsection 122(d). These adjustments converted "net loss" into net operating loss. The (d)(6) adjustment, a negative type of factor, tended to increase a net loss or reduce net income. Though not a base for imposing tax it was a base for a refund of tax. The identity of language and structure used in the two situations require the conclusion that what Congress intended in the other situations it must have intended here as well.

In spite of the Government's implication that Congress "overlooked" many things in connection with Section 122(d)(6) and that, therefore, this Court should legislate what was overlooked and deny the benefit of that section to accrual basis taxpayers, it is demonstrable that Congress devoted close and detailed attention to the section. It is also clear that duplication of benefit was deliberately prevented.

Among the examples of Congressional interest in the section are:

(a) The three qualifying Rules under (d)(6) applying to widely diverse situations.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

(b) The fact that a Section 26(e) credit never appeared under Section 122 where a (d)(6) adjustment was allowed. The Section 26(e) credit against net income was one allowed in the amount of income subject to excess profits tax.

(c) Adjustments under Section 122(b) involving the (d)(6) factor were in harmony with the Congressional concept that the payment of such tax was an economic loss.

(d) Sections 711(a)(1)(J) and (a)(2)(L) were restrictive provisions confining the operation of Section 122(d)(6). They indicated a Congressional consideration of the very question of double benefit and deliberately prevented it. It would be unwarranted to go beyond the limitation imposed by Congress itself without express authority.

(e) Section 26(c)(2), while incorporating the (d)(1), (2) and (3) adjustments carefully omitted the (d)(6) adjustment in a section of very narrow technical application.

It would be unreasonable to suppose that Congress drafted these complicated provisions to achieve nothing. For if paid or accrued were given the meaning the Government urges, that meaning inevitably would emasculate the section. Could Congress intend such a result?

A line of cases starting with Commissioner v. Clarion Oil Co., supra, has repeatedly held in the personal holding company context that "paid or accrued" need not necessarily refer to accounting methods as required by Section 48(c) and that where some statutory concept beyond net income was involved "paid or accrued" may receive their ordinary transactional meaning with reference to tax payments or tax accruals. This line of cases, therefore, distinguished those cases dealing with ordinary tax deductions from net income as inapposite. Three Circuit Courts, the Court of Claims, a District Court, and the Tax Court of the United States have all followed the Clarion Oil principle. It has recently been extended into the analogous situation of Section 102 where a construction similar to Clarion Oil Co. was given. Whether personal holding company surtax or improper accumulations of surplus were involved, these similar type of adjustments, just like the (d)(6) adjustment, helped taxpayers by reducing the base for the surtax.

The legislative history of Section 122(d)(6) and related provisions reveals that paid or accrued were intended to refer to transactions and not accounting methods. Two significant omissions under Section 122(d)(6) enacted by the Revenue Act of 1942, bear this out. The two omissions were, respectively, Rule (A), formerly appearing under Section 23(c)(2) and the absence of the Section 26(e) credit.

The 1941 Revenue Act allowed excess profits taxes as a deduction in computing net income (Code Section 23(c)(2)). That allowance was qualified by four rules, the first of which placed cash basis taxpayers on the same basis as accrual basis taxpayers by considering taxes paid after a taxable year as though paid within the taxable year. When Section 122(d)(6) was enacted by the Revenue Act of 1942, Rules (B), (C) and (D) formerly under Section 23(c)(2) became Rules (A), (B) and (C) under (d)(6). Why was Rule (A) omitted?

The answer is that the rule would have been meaningless in a loss year. No tax liability could arise or be imposed in the loss year. Thus, the words "paid or accrued" could not have related to the loss year but must have related to transactions dealing with taxes of prior years. In any other context "paid or accrued" were inapposite.

The second omission, that relating to Section 26(e), occurred for the same reason and warrants the same conclusion. The same section of the Revenue Act of 1942 which enacted Section 122(d)(6) dealt also with credit for dividends received and computation of Section 102 net income. Each of these sections contained specific reference to the new 26(e) credit yet no reference was made in Section 122(d)(6) with respect to that credit. Again the reason is attributable to the loss year. Where there was a loss there was no excess profits net income and hence no Section 26(e) credit. This omission likewise leads to the conclusion that "paid or accrued" related to prior year's taxes.

Committee reports indicate clearly that the purpose of the Section 122(d) adjustments, including (d)(6), was to sterilize net loss of non-economic factors and convert it into economic loss. Where the factors were used with a profit year (as in Section 122(b) or (c)) the effect was to convert net income into economic net income. These various adjustments at every stage of the computation from operating losses, through carry-back, to deduction made the connection between a (d)(6) adjustment and the final deduction very indirect. Moreover, the amount of the net operating loss deduction was derived from loss carry-overs and carry-backs from other years. Hence, Sections 43 and 48(c) did not apply as these items were not paid or accrued in the year of deduction.

In passing it should be noted that every attack made by the Government upon the taxpayer's contentions would, if valid, apply with equal vigor against a cash basis taxpayer in the identical situation and yet under the logic of the Government's theory a cash basis taxpayer who paid a tax in a loss year should benefit. Such inconsistency reveals the Government's real argument to be that it does not agree with the Congress and therefore Section 122(d)(6) should not apply to accrual basis taxpayers.

Even if it be held that "paid or accrued" technically and literally refers to methods of accounting as described in Section 48(c), then this Court should construe the quoted words in accordance with the Congressional intention already demonstrated. Where language is at odds with the purpose of the statute as demonstrated by an absurd or even unreasonable result arising from the words used, then this Court should follow the policy of the legislation as a whole. Applying that rule here the transactional meaning should be given to paid or accrued under Section 122(d)(6).

III

The fortuitous occurrence of another loss in 1947 resulted in the taxpayer having a net operating loss carry-back to and deduction in 1945 thereby recovering for the taxpayer the excess profits taxes for that year paid in 1946. The Government cites this as showing that no economic loss resulted from the payment of tax in 1946.

This argument, also made below, was not even adverted to there.

The Government contends that only the tax as finally determined after carry-back was "imposed," and only the tax "imposed" could be an economic loss.

Aside from the fact that the payment of money undoubtedly was an economic loss the fact is that the original tax for 1945 was imposed. This is indicated by Section 56(a) of the Code and the rationale of Manning v. Seeley Tube & Box Co., Inc., (1950) 338 U.S. 561.

That subsequent losses should not affect previously deducted taxes is also accepted by the Commissioner as indicated by two recent rulings.

The Government's argument tends to negative the annual accounting concept.

ARGUMENT

Introduction

The statutory provision the construction of which is in dispute is Section 122(d)(6)[6] of the Internal Revenue Code relating to net operating losses. To the extent here material that section provided:

[6] This section of the Code has no present application. Enacted by the Revenue Act of 1942, it was never repealed but was simply made inapplicable with respect to any taxable years ending after June 30, 1950. See Section 304 (e) of the Excess Profits Tax Act of 1950.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

> "There shall be allowed as a deduction the amount of tax imposed by subchapter E of Chapter 2[7] paid or accrued within the taxable year, * * *."

More specifically, the dispute centers about the words "paid or accrued." The problem is to determine the proper connotation of the quoted words when read in conjunction with Section 122(a) of the Code which defined the net operating loss to be:

> "* * * the excess of the deductions allowed by this Chapter over the gross income, with the exceptions, additions, and limitations provided in subsection (d)."

The taxpayer's position is that the words "paid or accrued" were disjunctives referring to tax transactions. The terms connoted respectively either the discharge of a liability for tax by payment or that a liability for tax had arisen.[8] These were the ordinary and usual meanings of these words. Inasmuch as the taxpayer actually "paid" or discharged its 1945 excess profits tax liability during the loss year 1946, it follows that under the statute the amount of such payment should be allowed as a deduction in computing the amount of net operating loss.

The Government reads the two words together and interprets "paid or accrued" to distinguish between taxpayers' methods of accounting. That is, "paid" refers to a payment if a taxpayer was on a cash receipts and disbursements basis and "accrued" refers to an accrual if a taxpayer was on the accrual basis. The Government argues that because the taxpayer was on the accrual basis it could not take into account the excess profits tax admittedly paid in 1946 because it had "accrued" in 1945.

[8] To distinguish the taxpayer's conceptual approach from that of the Government, the taxpayer's meanings may be regarded as "transactional" in nature while the Government adheres to an "accounting method" theory.

The taxpayer's position is supported in principle and reasoning by the language of the statute itself, by an analogous line of authority and is confirmed by the Congressional intent as manifested through the legislative history of the disputed section and related provisions.

I.

Only the Transactional Meaning of "Paid or Accrued" Permits Fair and Equal Treatment of All Corporate Taxpayers Regardless of Accounting Methods, as Intended by Congress

Before probing legislative history to discover Congressional intent, the nature of the problem suggests a practical approach; let the results under the opposing theories point the way to the legislative purpose and the proper construction. The taxpayer reads "paid or accrued" in the ordinary[9] or "transactional" sense while the Government construes "accounting methods." What are the practical effects of these opposed arguments? First the usual situation.

In the year 1945, every corporate[10] taxpayer was required to pay its excess profits tax in full on the fifteenth day of the third month following the close of its taxable year or in four quarterly installments during the year following the taxable year.[11] This was the usual or conventional way

[9] In addition to the holding of the Court below on this point, a similar rule appears in a number of cases involving personal holding company situations. See Commissioner v. Clarion Oil Co. (CCA DC, 1945) 148 F. (2d) 671, 677; cert. den. 325 U. S. 881; Birmingham et al., Exrs. v. The Loetscher Company (CCA-8, 1951) 188 F. The same rule also has been adopted in another situation, namely, improper accumulations of surplus arising under Chapter 1. See Harry M. Stevens, Inc. v. Johnson (DC SD NY, 1953) 115 F. Supp. 310, 312, (now pending before CCA-2).

Where a corporate taxpayer had a profit year in which it incurred an excess profits tax liability and the year following was a year of loss, then the excess profits tax liability for the profit year was routinely discharged by payment in the loss year. Under such circumstances, whether the taxpayer was on the cash or the accrual method of accounting, it met the requirements of Section 122(d)(6) under the taxpayer's theory. It had "paid" an excess profits tax within a loss year.

The "accounting method" sense the Government would place upon the words "paid or accrued," unlike this equitable result, produces a gross discrimination against the many accrual basis taxpayers and in favor of the few cash basis[12] taxpayers. A cash basis taxpayer, conventionally paying its liability for excess profits taxes in a loss year following a profit year, would obviously benefit under Section 122(d)(6). Its cash basis of accounting would recognize the payment as a "disbursement." In contrast, an accrual basis taxpayer under identical circumstances necessarily would be denied the benefit of the adjustment, under the Government's theory. For it, the taxes would have "accrued" in the year imposed and payment in the later year would have no effect under Section 122(d)(6).

Nor could the accrual basis taxpayer qualify under the Government's theory for an accrual in a loss year itself. To do so an accrual basis taxpayer would have had to incur an excess profits tax liability under Chapter 2 in a given year (based on taxable excess profits net income) and at the same time and for the same year incur a net operating loss (a negative net income figure) under Chapter 1. To state this is to indicate the answer. Ordinarily, [12] It is a commonly accepted truism that the great bulk of corporate taxpayers utilized the accrual method of accounting rather than the cash receipts and disbursements method.

therefore, it was obviously impossible to accrue both an excess profits tax liability and a net operating loss in the same year. The necessary result is that under the Government's theory the cash basis taxpayer could under ordinary circumstances qualify under Section 122(d)(6) while the much more significant class of corporate taxpayers—accrual basis—would automatically be disqualified. As to them, the benefits of the section would be "largely illusory." (See opinion below.)

There was also an unusual type of situation. Where liability for an additional (deficiency) tax was contested, such a contest would postpone the accrual of such a tax liability under well-recognized principles.[13] Termination of the dispute would fix the time of accrual and this could occur in a loss year.[14] Under such circumstances an excess profits tax liability "accrued" benefiting equally the cash or the accrual basis taxpayer under Section 122(d)(6).[15]

[14] See G.C.M. 25298, 1947-2 Cum. Bull., 39, 43. Compare Robert Reis & Co. (1953) 20 T.C. 294, where an accrual basis taxpayer had a dispute as to deficiencies, there was a consequent postponement of accrual and finally settlement and payment. The latter two events both occurred in the loss year and both factors were cited by the Court. Under either party's theory here, the taxpayer should have prevailed in the Reis case.

[15] It must be emphasized again, however, that the accrual case was an unusual type of situation. It is described as unusual to distinguish it from the situation where taxes were paid on liabilities reflected on returns. The latter were the more usual and much more important category. Dollarwise, collections of additional taxes are not nearly as significant as tax collections based on return liabilities. For example, the Annual Report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1953 discloses on page 4 that corporate income and profits taxes collected for that fiscal year aggregated $21.6 billions (789,984 returns filed—p. 6). In the same fiscal year additional corporate income and profits taxes including interest and penalties assessed as a

This would be so under either theory. The Government cites this rare situation to show that its theory is not entirely inequitable. Note, however, that even this situation involved a discrimination favoring taxpayers with tax troubles over those without them.

The Court of Claims below recognized the force of the inequities inherent in the strained construction of the Government, particularly in the usual situation. Therefore, it rejected the Government's argument in favor of the taxpayer, convinced as it was of the intentions of Congress in this regard. (R. 12, 13.) Even the Second Circuit Court of Appeals in the companion case of Lewyt Corporation v. Commissioner, 215 F. (2d) 518 at 526, candidly recognized the force of this argument although it refused to act upon it.[16] direct result of audit aggregated only $386 millions as shown on page 27 of the Report, or approximately 1.79 percent of the total (corporate returns examined totaled 110,996—p. 9). A similar Report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1946 discloses total corporate tax collections of $7,822,488,154 on page 20 thereof. Additional assessments of corporate taxes for that year were not published but the taxpayer was advised by the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue on February 10, 1955 that additional corporate taxes assessed had aggregated $274,546,554 or less than 3 percent of the total. The conclusion seems inescapable that in comparison with total tax payments deficiency payments were comparatively very small. The Section 721 type of situation also cited by the Government was even rarer.

[16] The Second Circuit recognizing these equities, nevertheless, felt bound by the supposed mandate of Section 48 (c). That Section defined "paid or accrued" (where the computation of net income was involved) to refer to methods of accounting. As later demonstrated, Section 48 (c) does not control in the case of the Section 122 (d) (6) adjustment. Neither net income nor its negative equivalent (net loss) were directly involved; economic loss was the result of the adjustment.

due to accounting method used, a taxpayer was at a temporary disadvantage.[17] This is a situation where in the course of corporate operations losses were admittedly incurred. Congress in its plenary taxing power afforded relief[18] to taxpayers incurring losses by permitting them to spread the tax effect of such losses over adjacent years.[19] What the [17] The latter usually occurred in transition periods—for example when excess profits taxes were repealed in 1945 the accrual basis taxpayer was taxed on sales accruals not actually received until after repeal, while the cash basis taxpayer escaped high taxes on comparable income. The discrimination inherent in the Government's theory, on the other hand, always existed and always worked against the same class of taxpayer.

[18] In a very real sense Section 122 (d) (6) was a war relief measure. At the time the Revenue Act of 1942 was enacted many corporations not in war production were already experiencing declining profits and at the close of the war economy many other corporations were expected to experience declining profits. The provisions of Section 122 afforded in effect the same type of relief in periods of declining profits which the two-year carry-forward provisions afforded in periods of increasing profits. 5 Mertens, Law of Federal Income Taxation, 1953 Ed., pp. 358-539.

During the war economy many normally deductible expenses were held down to a bare minimum by priorities, rationing, labor shortages and other factors beyond the control of the taxpayer. See Report No. 1631 of the Senate Finance Committee, 77th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 52. This situation was heightened by the operation of the excess profits tax law, which, because of the inability of taxpayers to take deductions for normal repairs and replacements would cause excessive net income which would be taxed as excess profits at a very high rate. Mertens, Ibid. See also Diamond A Cattle Co. (1953) 21 T.C. 1 at 7.

[19] The net operating loss deduction provision in taxing statutes and under the Code has had a checkered career. "In all its variations it has represented a response of Congress to the hardships caused by the taxable year as the measuring unit of time for determining tax liability, and in its inception in 1919 and its revival in 1939 was intended to favor taxpayers whose income was apt to fluctuate from year to year as well as those taxpayers whose business was in a period of development." Mertens, Ibid., p. 355.

Government suggests was a deliberate Congressional intent to discriminate against the great bulk of corporate taxpayers in that process. It should require the most unequivocal expression of Congressional intent to justify a deviation from the ordinary meaning of "paid or accrued" to warrant such a position. A somewhat similar attempt by the Government to attribute to the Congress an intent to discriminate[20] against cash basis taxpayers was rejected in Commissioner v. Clarion Oil Company, 148 F. (2d) 671, where it was said (at p. 676):

> "Nor did Congress intend that the taxpayer on an accrual basis who entered in his books an arbitrary amount as a 'reserve for taxes' should be in a better position than the taxpayer on a cash basis, * * *."

Congress must be presumed to have intended "equality among taxpayers."[21] The taxpayer's interpretation of the disputed phrase results in fair and equal treatment of corporate taxpayers regardless of accounting methods; the theory of the Government renders the section virtually inoperative for accrual basis taxpayers. Only the taxpayer's interpretation can be in harmony with the presumed purpose of Congress.

II.

Section 122(d)(6) Was Designed (Among Other Things) to Allow Corporate Taxpayers, Regardless of Accounting Methods, to take as a Deduction the Amount of Excess Profits Tax Actually Paid In A Loss Year in Determining the Amount of a Net Operating Loss.

It must be emphasized at the outset that Section 122(d)(6) applied if, and only if, a taxpayer incurred a net operating loss; where a taxpayer enjoyed profit years the section did not apply. The provision involved, therefore, a limited type of situation.

[20] That the purpose of a taxing statute would be frustrated by denial of equal tax treatment because of mere difference in accounting is also indicated by Commissioner v. The Hecht Co. (CCA-4, 1947) 163 F. (2d) 194, 196 and 199.

Congress did not define in the staute or in its Reports the meaning of the terms "paid or accrued" when used in Section 122(d)(6).[22] Their meaning must, therefore, be gleaned from an analysis of the words of the statute itself in the light of the legislative purpose as disclosed by the legislative history and corroborated by a collateral line of cases involving a similar principle in a similar type situation.

A. The language of the Code itself proves this by necessary inference.

1. Section 122(d)(6) provided the principal adjustment which could benefit a taxpayer in a loss situation.

Section 122 was captioned, "Net Operating Loss Deduction." Subsection (a) thereof defined a net operating loss; subsection (b) described how to convert a net operating loss into a net operating loss carry-back or carry-over and how to determine the amounts thereof; subsection (c) provided rules for converting the carry-backs and carry-overs into a net operating loss deduction and for determining the amount thereof.[23] Sub-section (d) was captioned, "Exceptions, additions and limitations" and was not designed to stand alone. It merely tabulated six adjustments various of which were specifically referred to by subsections (a), (b) and (c). Section 122(a) referred broadly to all the exceptions, additions and limitations provided in subsection (d). Section 122(b) and its various subparagraphs referred only to adjustments numbered (1), (2), (4) and (6). Section 122(c) referred only to adjustments (1), (2) (3) and (4). Only subsections (a) and (b), therefore, involved the (d)(6) adjustment.

It stands for the rule that "net operating loss" must be determined under the law in effect in the loss year, not the law in effect in the year of the net operating loss deduction.

Of the six adjustments listed under section 122(d), four of them—numbers (1), (3), (4) and (5)—either eliminated or reduced specific deductions claimed on returns. One of them—(d)(2)—required the inclusion of tax-exempt interest income less non-deductible interest on debts incurred to buy tax-exempt obligations. The first five adjustments[24] together constituted the "exceptions" and "limitations" re-

[24] The first five adjustments provided as follows:

"(1) The deduction for depletion shall not exceed the amount which would be allowable if computed without reference to discovery value or to percentage depletion under section 114(b), (2), (3), or (4);

"(2) There shall be included in computing gross income the amount of interest received which is wholly exempt from the taxes imposed by this chapter, decreased by the amount of interest paid or accrued which is not allowed as a deduction by section 23(b), relating to interest on indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry certain tax-exempt obligations;

"(3) No net operating loss deduction shall be allowed;

"(4) Gains and losses from sales or exchanges of capital assets shall be taken into account without regard to the provisions of section 117(b). As so computed the amount deductible on account of such losses shall not exceed the amount includible on account of such gains."

"(5) Deductions otherwise allowed by law not attributable to the operation of a trade or business regularly carried on by the taxpayer shall (in the case of a taxpayer other than a corporation) be allowed only to the extent of the amount of the gross income not derived from such trade or business. For the purposes of this paragraph deductions and gross income shall be computed with the exceptions and limitations specified in paragraphs (1) to (4) of this subsection."

ferred to in the caption. The sixth adjustment—the one here involved—allowed as a deduction the amount of excess profits tax imposed paid or accrued within the taxable year. This adjustment was the "addition" [25] referred to in the caption of Section 122(d) because it allowed an amount not deductible[26] on a return to be "added to" the excess of deductions over gross income.[27]

Of all the adjustments under (d), number (6) here involved was the only one beneficial to taxpayers once a loss had been incurred.[28] It tended to increase that loss by providing an additional deduction, thereby increasing the amount of the carry-back and the net operating loss deduction. This, of course, could result in a refund of overpayments for a prior year.

2. The excess profits tax paid under Section 122(d)(6) was not a conventional deduction under Section 23; therefore "paid or accrued" did not necessarily refer to accounting methods and Section 48(c) was inapposite. A question arises as to the exact significance of the phrase appearing in Section 122(d)(6), "there shall be allowed as

[25] Note that the word "additions" was added to the caption of Section 122(d) by the same section of 1942 Revenue Act which enacted Section 122(d)(6).

[26] As subsequently explained, excess profits tax could not be deducted in computing corporate net income per return in 1946.

[27] The simple excess of deductions over gross income referred to in Section 122(a) was not named in the Code. It may be referred to by the non-technical term "net loss" to distinguish it from "net operating loss" which contained in addition the adjustments provided in subsection (d).

[28] This is not surprising in view of the fact that the (d)(6) adjustment was a statutory descendant of former Section 23(c)(2). Congressional benevolence which formerly had permitted a deduction under that section for excess profits tax had, by the 1942 Revenue Act, discontinued the deduction for technical reasons and allowed instead the Section 122(d)(6) adjustment and a Section 26(e) credit. These two did not duplicate but rather tended to complement each other; one applying in loss and the other in profit years.

a deduction," with reference to excess profits tax "paid or accrued." The Government contends that this language required that the adjustment for excess profits tax paid or accrued be regarded as a conventional deduction, subject to the usual rules of statutory construction. Yet Section 23(c)(1)(B) specifically excepted excess profits tax paid or accrued from those which were deductible generally in 1946. Excess profits tax was placed among the exceptions by the identical section of the Revenue Act of 1942 which added Section 122(d)(6) to the Code.[29]

The taxpayer concludes, therefore, that Congress could not have intended the word "deduction" in Section 122(d)(6) to be the conventional, Section 23,[30] type of deduction.

[29] Section 105(d) of the Revenue Act of 1942 amended Section 23(c)(1)(B) of the Code by adding excess profits tax to the non-deductible ones. Section 105(e)(3) added subparagraph (6) to subsection 122(d) of the Code.

[30] This is expressly demonstrated by the following situation. Under Section 102(d)(1)(A), net income was required to be reduced by "excess profits taxes * * * paid or accrued during the taxable year, to the extent not allowed as a deduction by Section 23". In the absence of a saving clause, this language obviously would have included taxes under Chapter 2E which were not allowed as a deduction by Section 23(c)(1)(B). Therefore, to accomplish Congress' purpose of non-deductibility of Chapter 2E tax under Section 102, a parenthetic phrase appeared after the word "taxes" quoted above, couched in the following language:

> "(other than the tax imposed by Subchapter E of Chapter 2 for a taxable year beginning after December 31, 1940)".

This illustrates that taxes under Chapter 2E were not Section 23 "deductions" otherwise there was no need for the words in parenthesis.

Compare the situation under Section 505(a)(1) where net income was also required to be reduced by "excess profits taxes paid or accrued during the taxable year to the extent not allowed as a deduction under Section 23". Here, no parenthetic exception appeared and Chapter 2E taxes were, therefore, proper adjustments.

What may have been intended was that "the amount[31] of tax imposed" (either paid or accrued) should be "added to" the excess of deductions over gross income thereby tending to increase the amount of the net operating loss just as if it actually had been an additional deduction for this limited purpose.[32] The fact that conventional Section 23 "deductions" were not involved renders the Government's Argument I aside from the point. Sections 41, 43 and 48(c) are inapposite, therefore, as are the cases cited on pp. 13-14 of the Government's Brief. "Paid or accrued," therefore, were not controlled by these sections. This is not to deny, of course, that conventional deductions should be treated as the Government argues.

3. Other sections of the Code reveal a well-established Congressional technique of making tax "paid or accrued" adjustments to net income not controlled by Section 48(c). While somewhat out of the ordinary, the adjustments provided by Section 122(d) to be made to Section 122(a) bore a family resemblance to several other Code provisions in effect in mid-1940. Among such cousins were Sections 102(d)(1), 336(a), 505(a) and 711(a)(1) and (2). Although these sections related to such dissimilar corporate loopholes as improper accumulation of surplus, foreign and do-

[31] Perhaps this was Congress' way of permitting the adjustment under Section 122(d)(6) even though excess profits taxes were technically non-deductible. That is, only the "amount" of tax imposed was allowed to be "added" to the loss; the tax itself was not to be deducted. Whatever the rationalization, the non-deductibility is clear.

[32] The Court below felt that it would have to make an exception to the general rule prohibiting "shifting" from one method of accounting to another to "give effect to the plain intention of Congress". The taxpayer believes that such intent can be given effect without taking that position, simply by relying on the distinction here noted. This also disposes of the Government's suggestion that taxpayer is inconsistently seeking to shift some but not all of its operations to a cash basis. Bases of accounting have no place in this problem.

mestic personal holding companies and excess profits, they did have a common feature. This was the fact that each related to a "super-surtax"[33] or a tax imposed above and beyond normal taxes. In each case, the base upon which the "surtax" was levied was not ordinary net income but a different statutory concept above and beyond net income.[34]

Various adjustments were specified in the respective sections to convert net income in each case to the new base for tax. The adjustments themselves tended to differ between sections depending upon considerations germane to the particular legislative purpose in each case. Yet one similar type of adjustment was found in both of the personal holding company sections as well as Section 102. It was for Federal taxes paid or accrued.

In these three sections, otherwise non-deductible Federal taxes were allowed to reduce net income (the personal holding company provisions referred to "additional deductions" and Section 102 used a "minus"). And in each instance the taxes were described as "paid or accrued during the taxable year". In every case construing these provisions[35] it has been held uniformly that "paid or accrued" referred to transactions, not accounting methods; a tax base beyond net income was being computed and Section 48(c) did not apply.

[33] See 7A Mertens, supra, (1943 Ed.) 5 et seq. The term is Mertens'. He lists, in addition to those named, the declared value excess profits tax, the unjust enrichment tax and the tax on excess profits on Navy contracts.

[34] The respective terms were:

Section 102(d)(1)—net income into "section 102 net income"

Section 336—net income into "Supplement P net income"

Section 505—net income into "Subchapter A net income"

Section 711(a)—normal tax net income into excess profits net income [35] Section 102(d)(1) was thus construed in Harry M. Stevens, Inc. v. Johnson, supra.

Section 505(a)(1) was construed in Wm. J. Lemp Brewing Co., supra, Aramo-Stiftung v. Commissioner, supra, and Birmingham v. The Loetscher Company, supra.

The parallel between these provisions and Section 122(a) and (d)(6) is striking. Net loss (excess of deductions over gross income—negative net income) under Section 122(a) had to be adjusted for the "exceptions, additions and limitations" provided in subsection 122(d). These adjustments converted "net loss" into "net operating loss". The (d)(6) adjustment was a deduction for excess profits taxes "paid or accrued within the taxable year." As a negative (or deduction) factor it tended to reduce net income or, in a loss year, increase net loss. While the "net operating loss" was not a base for a surtax it was a negative base for the negative of tax—a refund (from carry-back and deduction).

From the foregoing, it is discernible why Congress used the technique it did in Section 122; from 1934[36] to the present time[37] Congress has used the type of device described. It is not surprising therefore, that Congress, in legislating on a matter involving payment or accrual of a non-deductible excess profits tax (a super-surtax itself), should follow its own pattern and adopt almost identical language used before appropriately adapted, however, to the requirements of a loss rather than a surtax situation. The Congressional intent in using "paid or accrued" in the similar provisions was firmly established. What was intended there must have been intended here.

4. Congress quite apparently devoted a considerable amount of time and attention in drafting detailed provisions regulating the implications and ramifications of Section 122(d)(6) and to avoid duplication of benefit to taxpayers by that provision; any further restriction by Courts through a narrower construction of "paid or accrued" than intended by Congress would be unwarranted.

The general flavor of the Government's Brief is that the Congress "overlooked" a lot of things in connection with Section 122(d)(6). The facts are to the contrary. The implication, however, is that this Court should legislate that which was overlooked and, presumably, hold the Section inapplicable to accrual basis taxpayers (with rare exceptions).

The following examples from the Code of detailed Congressional interest in Section 122(d)(6) may be cited:

(a) Congress provided three qualifying rules under (d)(6) dealing with matters as diverse as allowance of the full amount of excess profits tax paid unreduced by the foreign tax credit, the non-applicability of a technical loophole-plugging provision involving adjustments in the case of inconsistent positions and allocation of tax in the case of a consolidated return;

(b) Wherever the (d)(6) adjustment was referred to in Section 122 no reference was made to a Section 26(e) credit (for example, subsections (a), (b) and (d)); conversely, where reference to the Section 26(e) credit was made, the (d)(6) adjustment did not appear (as in Section 122(c)). The (d)(6) adjustment, therefore, was to apply in such a way that there would be no duplication of benefits[38] by having a Section 26(e) credit allowed in the same year;

(c) Sections 122(b)(1)(A) and (b)(2)(A),[39] allowed the

[38] Wherever there was a Section 26(e) credit, that indicated a profit year, such as the year of deduction of a net operating loss. In a loss year under 122(a) there could be no Section 26(e) credit (there being no adjusted excess profits net income). Even under Section 122(b)(1) where the (d)(6) adjustment occurred in a profit year (second year preceding the loss year) only the (d)(6) adjustment was allowed and not the Section 26(e) credit.

[39] These sections related to the net operating loss carry-back and carry-over types of situation. For example, in determining the amount of the carry-back to the year first preceding the year of

(d)(6) adjustment in harmony with the Congressional concept that payment of an excess profits tax was an "economic loss";

(d) The insertion of Sections 711(a)(1)(J) and (a)(2)(L) in the Code (by the 1942 Revenue Act) indicated Congressional preoccupation with the area of impact of Section 122(d)(6) and further indicated a deliberate attempt to curtail its operation. It would be unwarranted, therefore, to go beyond the limits Congress itself placed on the section[40] and add a significantly greater limitation by applying Section 48(c);

(e) Section 26(c)(2) carefully avoided an adjustment comparable to Section 122(d)(6) (although adopting the (d)(1), (2) and (3) adjustments) in a section of very narrow application controlling net operating loss carry-over credits in matters relating to Section 102 net income, Supplement P net income and Subchapter A net income.

loss, the net operating loss had subtracted from it the net income of the second preceding year after it had been adjusted for the 122(d)(1), (2), (4) and (6) factors. As the payment (or accrual but not both) of an excess profits tax in the second year preceding the loss year was an economic loss in that year, the statute permitted the amount of such payment (or accrual) to reduce net income at that time thereby increasing pro tanto the amount of the carry-back "overflow" to the year first preceding the loss year.

[40] It may be noted that while Section 122(d)(6) was a part of the original 1942 Revenue Bill as originally introduced in the House, the subsections of 711 referred to were first introduced as Senate floor amendments and were in turn amended by the Conference Committee. These provisions had been suggested by the Congressional legislative drafting staff and had been submitted to the Treasury where they had been approved. Apparently, they were inserted solely for the purpose of eliminating duplications and other imperfections in the net operating loss carry-over provisions as they applied to the computation of excess profits net income. It scarcely seems reasonable to suppose that the Congress drafted these complicated provisions using "paid or accrued" in an accounting sense in Section 122(d)(6) which would have the inevitable effect of virtually emasculating that section and the other mentioned. Yet that is what Congress intended, the Government insists[41]).

B. The Clarion Oil Company line of cases has established the rule: "Paid or accrued" may have different meanings under the Code; where necessary to produce a new statutory concept beyond net income these words may be given their ordinary meaning and not that of Section 48(c).

The Clarion Oil case, 148 F. (2d) 671, involved a cash basis taxpayer which paid its 1937 income and excess profits taxes in 1938. The question involved was the taxpayer's right to compute its "undistributed net income" for 1937 by subtracting from its net income for that year the amounts of income and excess profits taxes which "accrued" in 1937 but which were "paid" in 1938. The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia refused to follow the Tax Court in holding that the word "accrued" had to be construed with reference to the manner in which the taxpayer kept its accounts; it held that accounting methods were connoted by the terms "paid or accrued" only when net income was being determined. Speaking with reference to the definition of "paid or accrued" used in Section 48(c) (also relied on in this case by the Government) the Court of Appeals said at 675:

> "But obviously, this definition was intended to apply to the method of computing net income, and has no > reference or relevancy to the subject matter of what, for the purpose of the newly added provision in relation to personal holding companies, is taxable as undistributed income.[14] In other words, having determined 'net income' in accordance with the accounting methods of the taxpayer, there is no need to question whether an ordinary income tax was 'paid' or whether it was 'accrued', since in either event it was a deductible item and no longer represented accumulations of income, which it was the intent of this tax to force out of the 'incorporated pocketbook' and into the hands of individual taxpayers." (Emphasis in the original.)

Footnote 14 referred to in the quote held that cases dealing with the deduction of Federal taxes for purposes of "net income" were inapposite, citing as an example U. S. v. Anderson (1926), 269 U.S. 422. This case and related cases relied on by the Government there (p. 14 of its Brief) are inapposite for the reason indicated.

In discussing the inapplicability of the taxpayer's method of accounting the Court pointed out in Clarion that it was enough if the taxes were either paid or accrued in the taxable year. There was absent the administrative need for uniformity in computing "undistributed net income" (under Section 356(a)(1) of the Revenue Act of 1937) which was essential in the computation of net income.

The Eighth Circuit,[42] the Second Circuit,[43] the Court of Claims,[44] a District Court,[45] and the Tax Court[46] have all agreed with and followed the rationale of the Clarion Oil case in construing Section 48(c).

That construction also has been extended in a recent case[47] to Section 102(d)(1)(A) of the Code involving adjustments to net income to produce "Section 102 net income" by deducting inter alia Federal income tax "paid or accrued during the taxable year * * *."

It is true, of course, that Section 122 was a relief provision tending to favor taxpayers by virtue of allowance of net operating loss deductions while the Clarion Oil case involved the personal holding company penalty surtax. However, in both situations the adjustments themselves were favorable to taxpayers[48] and there was, moreover, the conceptual affinity of the way in which the adjustments were made. In both cases adjustments were made after the "administrative need for uniformity" had already been satisfied.

The Clarion Oil case by analogy also supports the taxpayer's position that adjustments to (not deductions used in computing) net loss produced a new statutory concept notably dissimilar—net operating loss. In Clarion the new concept was "undistributed net income"; here it was "net operating loss". There the purpose of the adjustments was to create a fair base for a penalty surtax; here the purpose was to create economic loss to be carried back.

C. As disclosed by the legislative history the Congressional intent in using the phrase "paid or accrued" in Section 122(d)(6) was to refer to transactions, not accounting methods.

1. The Revenue Act of 1942 made two significant omissions under Section 122(d)(6), both indicating that Congress referred to taxes of other years when it used "paid or accrued" and, therefore, did not intend to refer to accounting methods. These omissions were, respectively, the non-appearance of Rule (A) which had formerly qualified Section 23(c)(2) in a related situation and the absence of the Section 26(e) credit.

Of what significance was the omission of Rule (A)? Congress first enacted an excess profits tax in the general period here under consideration when it passed the Second Revenue Act of 1940 adding Subchapter E to Chapter 2 of the Internal Revenue Code. This Act was approved October 8, 1940, and applied to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1939. For 1940, Section 23(c) of the Internal Revenue Code as it then read permitted a direct deduction of taxes paid or accrued[49] within the taxable year (with certain exceptions) in determining net income. Included among the exceptions were the Chapter 2E excess profits taxes.[50]

Section 202(a) of the Revenue Act of 1941 (approved September 20, 1941) removed excess profits taxes (under Chapter 2E) from the list of exceptions to the general deduction rule and simultaneously added new subparagraph 2 to Section 23(c) which specifically permitted a direct deduction of imposed excess profits taxes in computing net income, subject however to four limiting rules. These provisions were effective as to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1940 or later years. Rule (A) of subparagraph 2 of Section 23(c) effectively placed all taxpayers on the accrual basis of accounting with respect to the excess profits tax payments for a taxable year. Rule (A) read:

> "The deduction shall be limited to the tax imposed for the taxable year but any portion of such tax paid after the taxable year shall be considered as having been paid within the taxable year; * * *."

The Revenue Act of 1942[51] (approved October 21, 1942), by Section 105(c) thereof, repealed Section 23(c)(2) of the Code and simultaneously restored excess profits taxes to the list of exceptions to the deduction rule. The very same section[52] of the 1942 Revenue Act which restored excess profits to the list of exceptions to the tax deduction provisions added the new provision—Section 122(d)(6)—to the Internal Revenue Code. Pertinent language in the Senate Report[53] was as follows:

> "Section 122 of the Code relating to computation of the net operating loss deduction allowed by section 23(s) of the Code, is amended so as to allow the excess profits taxes paid or accrued within taxable years (subject to certain rules) as a deduction in computing net operating loss for, and net operating loss carry-over and carry-back from, such taxable years."[54] (Emphasis supplied)

[51] This Act effected a major revision of the tax laws during the war period. Of importance here is the fact that it altered significantly the method of computing excess profits tax liability. Prior thereto the excess profits tax had been computed like an additional surtax and had been reflected on the income tax return form. Under the new act, separate tax bases were provided for the computation of the two taxes, the so-called "two-basket" principle. See H. R. No. 2333, 77th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 18.

[54] It may be observed that this language indicated a clear intention to allow the adjustment enacted as Section 122(d)(6). This emphasis should be unnecessary but in view of the impression given by the Government Brief it must be made. That Brief implies that Congress wrote the section to disallow the adjustment. See Argument I and I.A.

Rules (A), (B) and (C) qualifying Section 122(d)(6) were almost verbatim copies of Rules (B), (C) and (D) formerly appearing in Section 23(c)(2).[55] Significantly, Rule (A) which had appeared under Section 23(c)(2) did not reappear under Section 122(d)(6). This was the rule which had effectively placed all taxpayers on the accrual basis with respect to excess profits tax payments.

Recalling that the professed purpose of Congress in enacting Rule (A) under Section 23(c)(2) had been to accord all taxpayers, cash and accrual, the same treatment[56] with respect to the deduction of payments for excess profits tax, a question arises as to the significance of the apparently deliberate omission of Rule (A) from Section 122(d)(6). Maxims[57] of judicial construction suggest that the deliberate omission of Rule (A) indicates as a minimum that Congress did not thereby intend to have all taxpayers on the accrual basis under Section 122(d)(6) as they had been under Section 23(c)(2).

Another conclusion also seems warranted. As Congress intended in 1941 to accord both cash and accrual taxpayers the same treatment with respect to the adjustment for excess profits tax, it can scarcely be supposed that Congress by the enactment in 1942 of Section 122(d)(6) omitting Rule (A) intended to accord cash and accrual taxpayers a dissimilar treatment simply because of a change in the base for corporate tax. Certainly it should require a clear expression of intent to warrant a conclusion that Congress was abandoning equality[58] for discrimination, and the taxpayer can find none.

This much seems self-evident. What more may be inferred? The answer is found by considering the effect of Rule (A) if it had been enacted under Section 122(d)(6). That Rule under Section 23(c)(2) required a cash basis taxpayer to consider an excess profits tax paid after a taxable year as having been paid within the taxable year, the deduction being limited to the tax imposed in a profit year. This placed the cash and accrual basis taxpayers upon the same exact footing. While such a result was desirable and necessary, under Section 122(d)(6) such a Rule would have been meaningless.

In the first place, the taxable year would have been a loss year. Therefore, the cash basis taxpayer could have had no excess profits tax liability in the taxable year. But this would not have placed the cash basis taxpayer at a disadvantage for the accrual basis taxpayer likewise would have had no "accrued" tax liability in a loss year. These facts explain the absence of Rule (A) as unnecessary. They also warrant another conclusion.

When Congress left out Rule (A) it must have done so on the basis of the foregoing analysis. That analysis, of course, implicitly recognized that where the taxable year was a loss year, neither a cash nor an accrual basis taxpayer ordinarily could "accrue" an excess profits tax "within the taxable year". Nor would a tax be paid in the year imposed.

It is apparent, therefore, that neither "paid" nor "accrued" used in Section 122(d)(6) could have been intended to refer to methods of accounting. "Paid or accrued" in such a context would have been as inapposite as Rule (A). These terms must have referred of necessity to taxes of prior years[59] which were discharged by payment (paid) or which arose (accrued) in the taxable (loss) year. These are "transactional" meanings not "accounting methods" ones for these results would have been the same regardless of accounting methods.

The other omission occurred for the same reason and warrants the same conclusion. Section 105(e) of the Revenue Act of 1942 was captioned, "Technical Amend-[59] There is an earlier example of this type of construction. Under the 1936 Revenue Act personal holding companies were allowed deductions in computing adjusted net income of "not only ordinary Federal income and profits tax paid during the taxable year but also the special tax under Section 102." (H.R. No. 1546, 75th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 711-2. See S. R. No. 1242, same session) Thus, where a company paid during a current year, Section 102 taxes assessed for prior years, a benefit was gained, the Report explained. But Congress had not intended that Section 102 surtaxes should be paid out of current earnings. It had been intended that they should have been paid out of accumulations. Therefore, it was proposed that the 1937 Revenue Act amend Section 351 (of the 1936 Revenue Act) by making the Section 102 taxes specifically non-deductible.

Of significance is the fact that the amendment was made, not because of any question of accounting methods, but rather on the basis of Congressional policy as to Section 102. But more important is the fact that while Section 48(c) (defining paid or accrued to mean accounting methods) appeared in the 1936 Revenue Act as well as the 1937 Revenue Act it was flatly stated that taxes "paid during the taxable year" were deductible with no reference to accounting methods. While the amendment affected Section 102, no attempt was made to change the provisions allowing deductions for income and profits taxes "paid or accrued".

ments[60] Made Necessary By Change in Base for Corporate Tax." Section 105(e)(3) added Section 122(d)(6) to the Code. Sections 105(e)(1) and (2) related, respectively, to the credit for dividends received and to the computation of Section 102 net income. These two subparagraphs contained specific references to the newly added Section 26(e) credit (amount subject to excess profits tax). In each case, that credit was allowed as a reduction. But no reference to the Section 26(e) credit appeared in Section 105(e)(3) of the 1942 Revenue Act relating to Section 122(a) and (d)(6)—although Section 122(c) was amended by that Act to require a normal tax net income computation "without" such credit.

The reason is obvious. As there could be no excess profits net income in a loss year by definition[61] the 26(e) credit would always be naught in such a context. For the same reason, no excess profits tax liability could arise to be "accrued" in a loss year. Taxes were not paid in the [60] The Government makes an argument based upon the phrase "technical amendments", the substance of which is that there was something mutually exclusive in the concept of "technical amendments" on the one hand and a significant change in the law on the other. Assuming but not conceding that Section 122(d)(6) was a significant change, the basis of the Government's argument is not correct. The two subsections of Section 105(e) of the Revenue Act of 1942 immediately preceding subsection (3), which added the operating loss provisions here in issue, deal respectively with the credit for dividends received and computation of Section 102 net income. It can scarcely be considered that these provisions are any less significant than those relating to the occasional impact of a net operating loss. Moreover, other legislation bearing the caption of "technical" has dealt with more than narrow technical matters. See as a recent illustration the Technical Changes Act of 1953, 67 Stat. 615.

year imposed but in the subsequent year and none would be "imposed" in a loss year. It must be concluded, therefore, that the absence of the Section 26(e) credit in Section 122(a) or (d)(6) meant that the excess profits tax "paid or accrued" could not have referred to the tax for the loss year but must have related to the tax of a prior year. That being so, "paid or accrued" must have been used in a transactional sense.

2. The purpose of the Section 122(d) adjustments and (d)(6) in particular was to help convert net loss into economic loss. The frame of reference for this problem must take cognizance of the fact that the Revenue Act of 1942 amended the excess profits tax law so as to make the rates high enough to be confiscatory in nature.[62] It is not surprising therefore that Congress, to alleviate some hardship in such circumstances, liberalized certain pre-existing relief provisions[63] and enacted new ones.[64]. Among

[62] The Congressional intention was stated to be a "desire that the rearmament program should furnish no opportunity for the creation of new war millionaires or the further substantial enrichment of already wealthy persons." The provisions were applicable to all corporations whether or not directly engaged in the defense program. This Act increased the tax rates from a graduated scale ranging from 35 to 60 percent to a 90 percent rate, however, with an over-all limitation of 80 percent subject to a postwar credit of 10 percent. Compare H. R. No. 2894, 76th Cong., 3d Sess., p. 2.

[63] "The 1942 Act amendments substantially broadened the relief provisions, increasing their elasticity." See 7A Mertens, Law of Federal Income Taxation, (1943 Ed.) 18. One illustration bearing a close analogy to the provisions here in question was the allowance of a two-year carry-back of unused excess profits credits under Section 710(c)(3)(A). That provision was added by Section 204(b) of the Revenue Act of 1942 and was made retroactive to 1941.

the existing relief provisions which were expanded were those relating to net operating losses here involved.[65]

It is clear that Congress intended all six adjustments under Section 122(d) to have the effect of sterilizing net income or net loss as the case might be of all non-economic factors. Stated otherwise, the purpose was to convert net loss (excess of deductions over gross income) into economic loss[66] called "net operating loss".

Where a taxpayer "paid" an excess profits tax that transaction had an operational aspect and parting with cash was certainly an economic loss. By the same token the coming-into-existence of an excess profits tax liability by settlement of a dispute, for example, met the same tests.

As already indicated, the adjustments under Section 122(d) were variously referred to by subsections (a), (b), and (c). It follows, therefore, that the Congress not only provided that a net operating loss as defined should be sterilized of all non-economic loss elements but it applied the same concept in the computation of the amount of the net operating loss carry-backs and carry-overs, as well as in the computation of the amount of the net operating loss deduction itself. In the latter situations net income (not net loss) was converted into economic net income. Thus, even though the net operating loss deduction as finally determined under Section 122(c) was allowed as a deduction in computing net income by Section 23(s), it is inaccurate to describe and imply, as the Government does, that the adjustment provided by Section 122(d)(6) was a conventional deduction and directly involved in computing net income.

A number of convolutions were involved in going from the payment of an excess profits tax in a loss year to the [65] Significantly, the 1942 Revenue Act for the first time since the 1918 Revenue Act permitted a two-year carry-back of a net operating loss. See Section 122(b)(1).

[66] See House Ways and Means Committee Report No. 855, 76th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 17.

allowance of a deduction for a net operating loss in a prior year. During the course thereof it was quite possible that the (d)(6) adjustment could have been offset, consumed or otherwise altered so as to give no direct benefit as a deduction. The somewhat complicated computations required by Sections 122(b) and (c) in particular suggest a remote rather than a direct relationship.

More important, the amount of the net operating loss deduction depended primarily upon the amount of net operating loss carry-overs and carry-backs from other years. Necessarily, therefore, the deduction itself was not controlled by Sections 43 or 48(c) of the Code, for the deduction obviously was neither paid nor accrued in the year the deduction was sought. Only in the years where the net operating losses were incurred could the "paid or accrued" question really arise, and in those years, as already indicated, Section 48(c) does not apply.

Summarizing Argument II thus far, it has been established that:

The (d)(6) adjustment, enacted by Congress in an era of high taxes but in a spirit of tax relief, tended to benefit taxpayers who incurred losses. The adjustment itself was not a conventional deduction but involved treating an excess profits tax either paid or accrued "as if" it were a deduction. This adjustment, coming as it did after the prior determination of net income (or net loss) was not controlled by Section 48(c) and served to produce a new statutory concept, economic loss, which was typical of a number of similar concepts frequently used by the Congress.

Congress did not expressly define "paid or accrued" when used in Section 122(d)(6). It did, nevertheless, devote considerable attention and statutory language to the problems related to and created by Section 122(d)(6) which indicates the Congressional intent in this respect. The most significant deduction warranted is that Congress was not referring to taxes of the loss year itself when using the language "taxes paid or accrued within the taxable year." That this would have been an anomaly was indicated by the deliberate omission of both Rule (A) and the Section 26(e) credit from Section 122(d)(6). Because the taxes referred to as "paid or accrued" could not have related to the taxable year itself, they must have related to a prior taxable year. That being so, the only plausible meaning of the words would be in the transactional sense, the accounting method sense being inapposite.

Ironically, every attack which the Government makes on the taxpayer's position would, if valid, apply with equal force where a cash basis taxpayer paid an excess profits tax in a loss year. Yet the necessary logic of the Government's accounting method argument is that a cash basis taxpayer should benefit in such a situation. Such an inconsistent and untenable position suggests that the Government's real argument is that it does not agree with the Congress and, therefore, Section 122(d)(6) should not apply.

D. Even if it be held that "paid or accrued" literally referred to methods of accounting described in Section 48(c) when used in Section 122(d)(6), this Court may construe the quoted words to refer to transactions rather than accounting methods, if the former was the purpose even though not the literal meaning of the provision.

The supremacy of purpose over language was stated in U. S. v. American Trucking Associations, (1940) 310 U. S. 534, 543. Where words have a perfectly plain meaning that should be followed; however, where that meaning has led to absurd or futile results, this Court has looked beyond the words to the purposes of the act. This has been done even where the plain meaning did not produce absurd results but merely unreasonable ones which were, however, plainly at variance with the policy of the legislation as a whole.[67] As previously pointed out, the Government's argument produces gross inequities which are far beyond mere "unreasonable" results. Moreover, the taxpayer has demonstrated that the purpose of the legislation was to grant relief to taxpayers incurring losses by permitting excess profits tax paid in the loss year to be treated as a deduction in converting to economic loss. This was the purpose. If the result is otherwise because of literal meaning, then the purpose has not prevailed.

III.

The Fortuitous Occurrence of a Net Operating Loss in 1947 Which Produced a Net Operating Loss Deduction for 1945 and Hence Resulted in a Refund or Credit of That Year's Taxes Including the Excess Profits Tax Paid in 1946 Does Not, as a Matter of Law, Prevent the Deduction of Excess Profits Tax Paid in the Year 1946.

It was a sad fact that the taxpayer incurred a net operating loss in 1947 as well as in 1946. This fortuitous and unpleasant occurrence produced a net operating loss carryback from 1947 to 1945 where, after conversion into a net operating loss deduction, the 1945 excess profits tax liability was eliminated. The result was that refunds or credits were made to the taxpayer in 1947 and 1948[68] of the excess profits taxes for 1945 which had been paid in 1946. The Government concludes, therefore, that the taxpayer suffered no economic loss in 1946 by virtue of payment in 1946 of the 1945 excess profits tax liability.

Emphasizing the word "imposed" in Section 122(d)(6), the Government argues that because the excess profits taxes were subsequently refunded they did not represent an amount of tax actually imposd; only one excess profits tax was imposed for 1945 and that was the amount which was finally determined after application of the 1947 carry-back. The Government then cites some language out of context from the companion case of Lewyt Corporation in the Second Circuit Opinion and refers to a brief to be filed in Docket No. 417, the Lewyt Corporation case before this Court on certiorari. The same argument was raised by the Government in the proceeding below but was not even adverted to by the Court of Claims in either of two majority opinions or two dissenting opinions.

The taxpayer's position is that the payment of excess profits taxes in 1946 was, in a very real sense, an economic loss as the taxpayer was thereupon deprived of the use of $263,272.80.[69] The fact that the taxpayer recovered this amount by credit or payment several years later cannot obscure the fact that the taxpayer did suffer an economic loss by payment in the year 1946. That tax had been "imposed"; it had accrued in 1945 and had been paid in 1946.

A contrary view would be incompatible with this Court's opinion in Manning v. Seeley Tube & Box Co., supra. The "deficiency" referred to in that case, as computed under Section 271 of the Code, meant the amount "by which the tax imposed" exceeded the tax shown on the return. Necessarily, therefore, that opinion holds that a tax originally due for a taxable year was imposed even though a subse-

[69] There is a reverse analogy between this situation and that in Manning v. Seeley Tube and Box Co. (1950) 338 U. S. 561. In that case this Court regarded as significant the fact that a taxpayer had retained the use of tax funds which rightfully should have been in the possession of the United States. The Government was properly entitled to have and to use the mony owed to it during the period it was owed. Thus, interest on the tax deficiency was properly payable regardless of later elimination of such a deficiency by a subsequently incurred net operating loss.

quent net operating loss carry-back might eliminate tax liability for that year.[70]

Section 56(a) of the Code required a taxpayer to pay "the tax imposed by this Chapter" in the year following the taxable year. Necessarily, that tax "imposed" must have been prior to any net operating loss carry-back as no carry-back could have existed at such a time. Moreover, Section 122(d)(6) speaks of a tax imposed "paid or accrued within the taxable year" and not to events in a subsequent taxable year. The Government reads the quoted phrase as though it referred to taxes "finally imposed for

[70] With respect to this matter this Court stated at 566 and 567:

"The enactment of the carry-back provision in 1942 did not change this policy of the statute requiring prompt payment. This section was intended to afford taxpayers an opportunity to present for tax purposes a realistic, balanced picture of their profits and losses. It permits a taxpayer to add a net operating loss for one year to the deductions for the two previous taxable years. The Report of the Senate Committee on Finance states that the purpose of the section was to afford relief to cases where maintenance and upkeep expenses were deferred to peacetime years because of wartime restrictions. S. Rep. No. 1631, 77th Cong., 2d Sess., 51-52 (1942). But there is no indication that Congress intended to encourage taxpayers to cease prompt payment of taxes. The same Report, explaining the operation of the section which became the present carry-back provision, states, 'A taxpayer entitled to a carry-back of a net operating loss or an unused excess profits credit . . . will not be able to determine the deduction on account of such carry-back until the close of the future taxable year in which he sustains the net operating loss or has the unused excess profits credit. He must therefore file his return and pay his tax without regard to such deduction, and must file his claim for refund at the close of the succeeding taxable year when he is able to determine the amount of such carry-back.' S. Rep. No. 1631 at 123-124. the taxable year". Since subsequent events may not be taken into account in determining payment or accrual,[71] the only tax imposed, which was paid or accrued within the taxable year 1946, was the tax paid in 1946, no tax liability having arisen with respect to the year 1946.

It does seem apparent, however, that the word "imposed" should not necessarily have been confined either to the initial or the ultimate tax liability; it had an ambulatory meaning appropriate in either case. As used here it was only descriptive of a statutory liability for tax and not designed as a limitation.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue apparently regards the word in the same light as does the taxpayer and in a similar context. A recent ruling relating to Section 102(d)(1)(A) of the Code, which permitted a deduction from "Section 102 net income" for "income, war profits, and excess profits taxes * * * paid or accrued during the taxable year * * * but not including the tax imposed by this section * * *." held that even though such taxes were ultimately refunded as a result of a subsequent net operating loss carry-back, nevertheless the above deduction was to be determined without regard to such carry-back.[72]

The effect of the Government's argument is to nullify the annual accounting concept embedded in the tax system for many years.[73] The Government here reads the word

[73] This Court stated in Edwin E. Healy v. Commissioner (1953) 345 U. S. 278 at 284:

> "Congress has enacted an annual accounting system under which income is counted up at the end of each year. It would be disruptive of an orderly collection of the revenue to rule that the counting must be done over again to reflect events occurring after the year for which the count is made, and would

"imposed" as though it had some magic significance. The term has not been specifically defined in any statute so far as the taxpayer can determine. However, some indication of the Congressional understanding of the meaning of that word appears in the language of the House Ways and Means Committee Report filed in connection with the Revenue Code of 1954 which stated:[74]

> "The use of the word 'imposed' rather than 'levied, collected, and paid' is only a modernization of language."

CONCLUSION

For the reasons above-stated, the judgment of the Court of Claims should be affirmed.

violate the spirit of the annual accounting system. This basic principle cannot be changed simply because it is of advantage to a taxpayer or to the government in a particular case that a different rule be followed."

While it is true that net operating loss carry-back provisions are in themselves something of a modification of the annual accounting concept, this is not to concede tha a simple paymen of tax occurring in a loss year is anything but an economic loss. The effect of the Government's argument is to admit that a payment in 1946 was an economic loss at that time but to deny that it was an economic loss in 1948.

BROWN ET AL. v. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF TOPEKA ET AL.

NO. 1. APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF KANSAS.*

Argued December 9, 1952.—Reargued December 8, 1953.—Decided May 17, 1954.

Segregation of white and Negro children in the public schools of a State solely on the basis of race, pursuant to state laws permitting or requiring such segregation, denies to Negro children the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment—even though the physical facilities and other "tangible" factors of white and Negro schools may be equal. Pp. 486–496.

(a) The history of the Fourteenth Amendment is inconclusive as to its intended effect on public education. Pp. 489–490.

(b) The question presented in these cases must be determined, not on the basis of conditions existing when the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted, but in the light of the full development of public education and its present place in American life throughout the Nation. Pp. 492–493.

(c) Where a State has undertaken to provide an opportunity for an education in its public schools, such an opportunity is a right which must be made available to all on equal terms. P. 493.

(d) Segregation of children in public schools solely on the basis of race deprives children of the minority group of equal educational opportunities, even though the physical facilities and other "tangible" factors may be equal. Pp. 493–494.

(e) The "separate but equal" doctrine adopted in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, has no place in the field of public education. P. 495.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE WARREN delivered the opinion of the Court.

These cases come to us from the States of Kansas, South Carolina, Virginia, and Delaware. They are premised on different facts and different local conditions, but a common legal question justifies their consideration together in this consolidated opinion.[1]

[1] In the Kansas case, Brown v. Board of Education, the plaintiffs are Negro children of elementary school age residing in Topeka. They brought this action in the United States District Court for the District of Kansas to enjoin enforcement of a Kansas statute which permits, but does not require, cities of more than 15,000 population to maintain separate school facilities for Negro and white students. Kan. Gen. Stat. § 72-1724 (1949). Pursuant to that authority, the Topeka Board of Education elected to establish segregated elementary schools. Other public schools in the community, however, are operated on a nonsegregated basis. The three-judge District Court, convened under 28 U. S. C. §§ 2281 and 2284, found that segregation in public education has a detrimental effect upon Negro children, but denied relief on the ground that the Negro and white schools were substantially equal with respect to buildings, transportation, curricula, and educational qualifications of teachers. 98 F. Supp. 797. The case is here on direct appeal under 28 U. S. C. § 1253.

In the South Carolina case, Briggs v. Elliott, the plaintiffs are Negro children of both elementary and high school age residing in Clarendon County. They brought this action in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of South Carolina to enjoin enforcement of provisions in the state constitution and statutory code which require the segregation of Negroes and whites in public schools. S. C. Const., Art. XI, § 7; S. C. Code § 5377 (1942). The three-judge District Court, convened under 28 U. S. C. §§ 2281 and 2284, denied the requested relief. The court found that the Negro schools were inferior to the white schools and ordered the defendants to begin immediately to equalize the facilities. But the court sustained the validity of the contested provisions and denied the plaintiffs admission to the white schools during the equalization program. 98 F. Supp. 529. This Court vacated the District Court's judgment and remanded the case for the purpose of obtaining the court's views on a report filed by the defendants concerning the progress made in the equalization program. 342 U. S. 350. On remand, the District Court found that substantial equality had been achieved except for buildings and that the defendants were proceeding to rectify this inequality as well. 103 F. Supp. 920. The case is again here on direct appeal under 28 U. S. C. § 1253.

In the Virginia case, Davis v. County School Board, the plaintiffs are Negro children of high school age residing in Prince Edward County. They brought this action in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia to enjoin enforcement of provisions in the state constitution and statutory code which require the segregation of Negroes and whites in public schools. Va. Const., § 140; Va. Code § 22–221 (1950). The three-judge District Court, convened under 28 U. S. C. §§ 2281 and 2284, denied the requested relief. The court found the Negro school inferior in physical plant, curricula, and transportation, and ordered the defendants forthwith to provide substantially equal curricula and transportation and to "proceed with all reasonable diligence and dispatch to remove" the inequality in physical plant. But, as in the South Carolina case, the court sustained the validity of the contested provisions and denied the plaintiffs admission to the white schools during the equalization program. 103 F. Supp. 337. The case is here on direct appeal under 28 U. S. C. § 1253.

In the Delaware case, Gebhart v. Belton, the plaintiffs are Negro children of both elementary and high school age residing in New Castle County. They brought this action in the Delaware Court of Chancery to enjoin enforcement of provisions in the state constitution and statutory code which require the segregation of Negroes and whites in public schools. Del. Const., Art. X, § 2; Del. Rev. Code § 2631 (1935). The Chancellor gave judgment for the plaintiffs and ordered their immediate admission to schools previously attended only by white children, on the ground that the Negro schools were inferior with respect to teacher training, pupil-teacher ratio, extracurricular activities, physical plant, and time and distance in-they had been denied admission to schools attended by white children under laws requiring or permitting segregation according to race. This segregation was alleged to deprive the plaintiffs of the equal protection of the laws under the Fourteenth Amendment. In each of the cases other than the Delaware case, a three-judge federal district court denied relief to the plaintiffs on the so-called "separate but equal" doctrine announced by this Court in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537. Under that doctrine, equality of treatment is accorded when the races are provided substantially equal facilities, even though these facilities be separate. In the Delaware case, the Supreme Court of Delaware adhered to that doctrine, but ordered that the plaintiffs be admitted to the white schools because of their superiority to the Negro schools.

The plaintiffs contend that segregated public schools are not "equal" and cannot be made "equal," and that hence they are deprived of the equal protection of the laws. Because of the obvious importance of the question presented, the Court took jurisdiction.[2] Argument was heard in the 1952 Term, and reargument was heard this Term on certain questions propounded by the Court.[3]

The Chancellor also found that segregation itself results in an inferior education for Negro children (see note 10, infra), but did not rest his decision on that ground. Id., at 865. The Chancellor's decree was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Delaware, which intimated, however, that the defendants might be able to obtain a modification of the decree after equalization of the Negro and white schools had been accomplished. 91 A. 2d 137, 152. The defendants, contending only that the Delaware courts had erred in ordering the immediate admission of the Negro plaintiffs to the white schools, applied to this Court for certiorari. The writ was granted, 344 U. S. 891. The plaintiffs, who were successful below, did not submit a cross-petition.

Reargument was largely devoted to the circumstances surrounding the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868. It covered exhaustively consideration of the Amendment in Congress, ratification by the states, then existing practices in racial segregation, and the views of proponents and opponents of the Amendment. This discussion and our own investigation convince us that, although these sources cast some light, it is not enough to resolve the problem with which we are faced. At best, they are inconclusive. The most avid proponents of the post-War Amendments undoubtedly intended them to remove all legal distinctions among "all persons born or naturalized in the United States." Their opponents, just as certainly, were antagonistic to both the letter and the spirit of the Amendments and wished them to have the most limited effect. What others in Congress and the state legislatures had in mind cannot be determined with any degree of certainty.

An additional reason for the inconclusive nature of the Amendment's history, with respect to segregated schools, is the status of public education at that time.[4] In the South, the movement toward free common schools, sup-

[4] For a general study of the development of public education prior to the Amendment, see Butts and Cremin, A History of Education in American Culture (1953), Pts. I, II; Cubberley, Public Education in the United States (1934 ed.), cc. II–XII. School practices current at the time of the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment are described in Butts and Cremin, supra, at 269–275; Cubberley, supra, at 288–339, 408–431; Knight, Public Education in the South (1922), cc. VIII, IX. See also H. Ex. Doc. No. 315, 41st Cong., 2d Sess. (1871). Although the demand for free public schools followed substantially the same pattern in both the North and the South, the development in the South did not begin to gain momentum until about 1850, some twenty years after that in the North. The reasons for the somewhat slower development in the South (e. g., the rural character of the South and the different regional attitudes toward state assistance) are well explained in Cubberley, supra, at 408–423. In the country as a whole, but particularly in the South, the War ported by general taxation, had not yet taken hold. Education of white children was largely in the hands of private groups. Education of Negroes was almost nonexistent, and practically all of the race were illiterate. In fact, any education of Negroes was forbidden by law in some states. Today, in contrast, many Negroes have achieved outstanding success in the arts and sciences as well as in the business and professional world. It is true that public school education at the time of the Amendment had advanced further in the North, but the effect of the Amendment on Northern States was generally ignored in the congressional debates. Even in the North, the conditions of public education did not approximate those existing today. The curriculum was usually rudimentary; ungraded schools were common in rural areas; the school term was but three months a year in many states; and compulsory school attendance was virtually unknown. As a consequence, it is not surprising that there should be so little in the history of the Fourteenth Amendment relating to its intended effect on public education.

In the first cases in this Court construing the Fourteenth Amendment, decided shortly after its adoption, the Court interpreted it as proscribing all state-imposed discriminations against the Negro race.[5] The doctrine of virtually stopped all progress in public education. Id., at 427–428. The low status of Negro education in all sections of the country, both before and immediately after the War, is described in Beale, A History of Freedom of Teaching in American Schools (1941), 112–132, 175–195. Compulsory school attendance laws were not generally adopted until after the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment, and it was not until 1918 that such laws were in force in all the states. "separate but equal" did not make its appearance in this Court until 1896 in the case of Plessy v. Ferguson, supra, involving not education but transportation.[6] American courts have since labored with the doctrine for over half a century. In this Court, there have been six cases involving the "separate but equal" doctrine in the field of public education.[7] In Cumming v. County Board of Education, 175 U. S. 528, and Gong Lum v. Rice, 275 U. S. 78, the validity of the doctrine itself was not challenged.[8] In more recent cases, all on the graduate school declaring that the law in the States shall be the same for the black as for the white; that all persons, whether colored or white, shall stand equal before the laws of the States, and, in regard to the colored race, for whose protection the amendment was primarily designed, that no discrimination shall be made against them by law because of their color? The words of the amendment, it is true, are prohibitory, but they contain a necessary implication of a positive immunity, or right, most valuable to the colored race,—the right to exemption from unfriendly legislation against them distinctively as colored,—exemption from legal discriminations, implying inferiority in civil society, lessening the security of their enjoyment of the rights which others enjoy, and discriminations which are steps towards reducing them to the condition of a subject race."

See also Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313, 318 (1880); Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339, 344–345 (1880).

[6] The doctrine apparently originated in Roberts v. City of Boston, 59 Mass. 198, 206 (1850), upholding school segregation against attack as being violative of a state constitutional guarantee of equality. Segregation in Boston public schools was eliminated in 1855. Mass. Acts 1855, c. 256. But elsewhere in the North segregation in public education has persisted in some communities until recent years. It is apparent that such segregation has long been a nationwide problem, not merely one of sectional concern.

[7] See also Berea College v. Kentucky, 211 U. S. 45 (1908).

[8] In the Cumming case, Negro taxpayers sought an injunction requiring the defendant school board to discontinue the operation of a high school for white children until the board resumed operation of a high school for Negro children. Similarly, in the Gong Lum case, the plaintiff, a child of Chinese descent, contended only that state authorities had misapplied the doctrine by classifying him with Negro children and requiring him to attend a Negro school.

level, inequality was found in that specific benefits enjoyed by white students were denied to Negro students of the same educational qualifications. Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337; Sipuel v. Oklahoma, 332 U. S. 631; Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629; McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637. In none of these cases was it necessary to re-examine the doctrine to grant relief to the Negro plaintiff. And in Sweatt v. Painter, supra, the Court expressly reserved decision on the question whether Plessy v. Ferguson should be held inapplicable to public education.

In the instant cases, that question is directly presented. Here, unlike Sweatt v. Painter, there are findings below that the Negro and white schools involved have been equalized, or are being equalized, with respect to buildings, curricula, qualifications and salaries of teachers, and other "tangible" factors.[9] Our decision, therefore, cannot turn on merely a comparison of these tangible factors in the Negro and white schools involved in each of the cases. We must look instead to the effect of segregation itself on public education.

In approaching this problem, we cannot turn the clock back to 1868 when the Amendment was adopted, or even to 1896 when Plessy v. Ferguson was written. We must consider public education in the light of its full development and its present place in American life throughout the Nation. Only in this way can it be determined if segregation in public schools deprives these plaintiffs of the equal protection of the laws.

[9] In the Kansas case, the court below found substantial equality as to all such factors. 98 F. Supp. 797, 798. In the South Carolina case, the court below found that the defendants were proceeding "promptly and in good faith to comply with the court's decree." 103 F. Supp. 920, 921. In the Virginia case, the court below noted that the equalization program was already "afoot and progressing" (103 F. Supp. 337, 341); since then, we have been advised, in the Virginia Attorney General's brief on reargument, that the program has now been completed. In the Delaware case, the court below similarly noted that the state's equalization program was well under way. 91 A. 2d 137, 149.

Today, education is perhaps the most important function of state and local governments. Compulsory school attendance laws and the great expenditures for education both demonstrate our recognition of the importance of education to our democratic society. It is required in the performance of our most basic public responsibilities, even service in the armed forces. It is the very foundation of good citizenship. Today it is a principal instrument in awakening the child to cultural values, in preparing him for later professional training, and in helping him to adjust normally to his environment. In these days, it is doubtful that any child may reasonably be expected to succeed in life if he is denied the opportunity of an education. Such an opportunity, where the state has undertaken to provide it, is a right which must be made available to all on equal terms.

We come then to the question presented: Does segregation of children in public schools solely on the basis of race, even though the physical facilities and other "tangible" factors may be equal, deprive the children of the minority group of equal educational opportunities? We believe that it does.

In Sweatt v. Painter, supra, in finding that a segregated law school for Negroes could not provide them equal educational opportunities, this Court relied in large part on "those qualities which are incapable of objective measurement but which make for greatness in a law school." In McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, supra, the Court, in requiring that a Negro admitted to a white graduate school be treated like all other students, again resorted to intangible considerations: ". . . his ability to study, to engage in discussions and exchange views with other students, and, in general, to learn his profession."

Such considerations apply with added force to children in grade and high schools. To separate them from others of similar age and qualifications solely because of their race generates a feeling of inferiority as to their status in the community that may affect their hearts and minds in a way unlikely ever to be undone. The effect of this separation on their educational opportunities was well stated by a finding in the Kansas case by a court which nevertheless felt compelled to rule against the Negro plaintiffs:

> "Segregation of white and colored children in public schools has a detrimental effect upon the colored children. The impact is greater when it has the sanction of the law; for the policy of separating the races is usually interpreted as denoting the inferiority of the negro group. A sense of inferiority affects the motivation of a child to learn. Segregation with the sanction of law, therefore, has a tendency to [retard] the educational and mental development of negro children and to deprive them of some of the benefits they would receive in a racial[ly] integrated school system." [10]

Whatever may have been the extent of psychological knowledge at the time of Plessy v. Ferguson, this finding is amply supported by modern authority.[11] Any language in Plessy v. Ferguson contrary to this finding is rejected.

[10] A similar finding was made in the Delaware case: "I conclude from the testimony that in our Delaware society, State-imposed segregation in education itself results in the Negro children, as a class, receiving educational opportunities which are substantially inferior to those available to white children otherwise similarly situated." 87 A. 2d 862, 865.

We conclude that in the field of public education the doctrine of "separate but equal" has no place. Separate educational facilities are inherently unequal. Therefore, we hold that the plaintiffs and others similarly situated for whom the actions have been brought are, by reason of the segregation complained of, deprived of the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. This disposition makes unnecessary any discussion whether such segregation also violates the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[12]

Because these are class actions, because of the wide applicability of this decision, and because of the great variety of local conditions, the formulation of decrees in these cases presents problems of considerable complexity. On reargument, the consideration of appropriate relief was necessarily subordinated to the primary question—the constitutionality of segregation in public education. We have now announced that such segregation is a denial of the equal protection of the laws. In order that we may have the full assistance of the parties in formulating decrees, the cases will be restored to the docket, and the parties are requested to present further argument on Questions 4 and 5 previously propounded by the Court for the reargument this Term.[13] The Attorney General
